PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FOURTEENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1816.

MONDAY, December 2, 1816.

The second session of the Fourteenth Congress, conformably to the Constitution of the United States, commenced this day at the City of Washington; and the Senate assembled.

PRESENT:

JEREMIAH MASON and THOMAS W. THOMPSON, from the State of New Hampshire.

JOSEPH B. VARNUM and ELI P. ASHMUN, from Massachusetts.

JEREMIAH B. HOWELL, from Rhode Island.

ISAAC TICHENOR, from Vermont.

DAVID DAGGETT, from Connecticut.

NATHAN SANFORD, from New York.

JOHN CONDUIT and JAMES J. WILSON, from New Jersey.

ABNER LACOCK, from Pennsylvania.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from Delaware.

JAMES BARBOUR and ARMISTEAD T. MASON, from Virginia.

NATHANIEL MACON, from North Carolina.

JOHN GAILLARD, from South Carolina.

CHARLES TAIT, from Georgia.

JOHN WILLIAMS, from Tennessee.

JEREMIAH MORROW and BENJAMIN RUGGLES, from Ohio.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN, from Louisiana.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

ELI P. ASHMUN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the room of Christopher Gore, resigned, produced his credentials, was qualified, and he took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of the appointment of JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, as Senators, by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which were read.

Whereupon, on motion by Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Indiana into the Union, or for extending to that State the laws of the United States.

Messrs. MORROW, DAGGETT, and BARBOUR, were appointed the committee.

On motion by Mr. MORROW, the credentials of the appointment of JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, as Senators to represent the said State of Indiana in the Senate of the United States, were referred to the said committee, to consider and report thereon.

On motion by Mr. TAIT, the Secretary was directed to acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

Mr. VARNUM submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal a law passed the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Delegates from Territories," and that a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill for that purpose.

On motion by Mr. LACOCK,

Resolved That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers, printed in the United States, as he may choose, provided the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers; and provided, also, that if any Senator shall choose to take any newspapers other than daily papers, he shall be supplied with as many such papers as shall not exceed the price of three daily papers.

On motion by Mr. HOWELL, a committee was appointed agreeably to the forty-second rule for conducting business in the Senate, and Messrs. HOWELL, LACOCK, and THOMPSON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. HOWELL submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, That two Chaplains of different denominations be appointed to Congress, during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and ready to proceed to business. They have appointed a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the

SENATE.

Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them; in which resolution they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate concurred in the appointment of a joint committee on their part, agreeably to the resolution last mentioned; and Messrs. BARBOUR and MACON were appointed the committee.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, a committee was appointed, agreeably to the twenty-second rule, for conducting business in the Senate. Messrs. WILSON, FROMENTIN, and ASHMUN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. FROMENTIN submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, shall have the direction of the money appropriated to the purchase of books, and maps, for the use of the two Houses of Congress.

On motion by Mr. FROMENTIN, it was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, it was reported to the House, read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

Messrs. FROMENTIN, GOLDSBOROUGH, and HUNTER, were appointed the committee.

TUESDAY, December 3.

Mr. BARBOUR reported from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President had informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day at 12 o'clock.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, That Mountjoy Bayly, Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, be, and he hereby is, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper of the Senate, which expense should be paid out of the contingent fund.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, relative to the repeal of the compensation law; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The resolution for the appointment of Chaplains was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In reviewing the present state of our country, our attention cannot be withheld from the effect produced by peculiar seasons, which have very generally impaired the annual gifts of the earth, and threatened scarcity in particular districts. Such, however, is the variety of soils, of climates, and of products, within our extensive limits, that the aggregate resources for subsistence are more than sufficient for the aggregate wants. And as far as an economy of consumption, more than usual, may be necessary, our thankfulness is due to Providence for what is far more than a compensation, in the remarkable health which has distinguished the present year.

Amidst the advantages which have succeeded the peace of Europe, and that of the United States with Great Britain, in a general invigoration of industry among us, and in the extension of our commerce, the value of which is more and more disclosing itself to commercial nations, it is to be regretted that a depression is experienced by particular branches of our manufactures, and by a portion of our navigation. As the first proceeds, in an essential degree, from an excess of imported merchandise, which carries a check in its own tendency, the cause, in its present extent, cannot be of very long duration. The evil will not, however, be viewed by Congress, without a recollection, that manufacturing establishments, if suffered to sink too low, or languish too long, may not revive, after the causes shall have ceased; and that, in the vicissitudes of human affairs, situations may recur, in which a dependence on foreign sources, for indispensable supplies, may be among the most serious embarrassments.

The depressed state of our navigation is to be ascribed, in a material degree, to its exclusion from the colonial ports of the nation most extensively connected with us in commerce, and from the indirect operation of that exclusion.

Previous to the late convention at London, between the United States and Great Britain, the relative state of the navigation laws of the two countries, growing out of the Treaty of 1794, had given to the British navigation a material advantage over the American, in the intercourse between the American ports and British ports in Europe. The convention of London equalized the laws of the two countries, relating to those ports; leaving the intercourse between our ports and the ports of the British colonies subject, as before, to the respective regulations of the parties. The British Government enforcing, now, regulations which prohibit a trade between its colonies and the United States, in American vessels, whilst they permit a trade in British vessels, the American navigation loses accordingly; and the loss is augmented by the advantage which is given to the British competition over the American, in the navigation between our ports and British ports in Europe, by the circuitous voyages, enjoyed by the one and not enjoyed by the other.

The reasonableness of the rule of reciprocity, applied to one branch of the commercial intercourse, has been pressed on our part as equally applicable to both branches; but it is ascertained that the British Cabinet declines all negotiation on the subject, with a disavowal, however, of any disposition to view, in an unfriendly light, whatever countervailing regulations the United States may oppose to the regulations of which they complain. The wisdom of the Legislature will decide on the course which, under these circumstances, is prescribed by a joint regard to the amicable relations between the two nations and to the just interests of the United States.

DECEMBER, 1816.

President's Annual Message.

SENATE.

I have the satisfaction to state, generally, that we remain in amity with foreign Powers.

An occurrence has, indeed, taken place in the Gulf of Mexico, which, if sanctioned by the Spanish Government, may make an exception as to that Power. According to the report of our naval commander on that station, one of our public armed vessels was attacked by an overpowering force, under a Spanish commander, and the American flag, with the officers and crew, insulted, in a manner calling for prompt reparation. This has been demanded. In the meantime a frigate and a smaller vessel of war have been ordered into that Gulf for the protection of our commerce. It would be improper to omit, that the representative of His Catholic Majesty, in the United States, lost no time in giving the strongest assurances that no hostile order could have emanated from his Government, and that it will be as ready to do, as to expect, whatever the nature of the case and the friendly relations of the two countries shall be found to require.

The posture of our affairs with Algiers, at the present moment, is not known. The Dey, drawing pretexts from circumstances, for which the United States were not answerable, addressed a letter to this Government, declaring the treaty last concluded with him to have been annulled by our violation of it; and presenting as the alternative, war, or a renewal of the former treaty, which stipulated among other things an annual tribute. The answer, with an explicit declaration that the United States preferred war to tribute, required his recognition and observance of the treaty last made, which abolishes tribute and the slavery of our captured citizens. The result of the answer has not been received. Should he renew his warfare on our commerce, we rely on the protection it will find in our naval force actually in the Mediterranean.

With the other Barbary States our affairs have undergone no change.

The Indian tribes within our limits appear also disposed to remain at peace. From several of them purchases of lands have been made, particularly favorable to the wishes and security of our frontier settlements, as well as to the general interests of the nation. In some instances, the titles, though not supported by due proof, and clashing, those of one tribe with the claims of another, have been extinguished by double purchases; the benevolent policy of the United States preferring the augmented expense, to the hazard of doing injustice, or to the enforcement of injustice against a feeble and untutored people, by means involving or threatening an effusion of blood. I am happy to add, that the tranquillity which has been restored among the tribes themselves, as well as between them and our own population, will favor the resumption of the work of civilization, which had made an encouraging progress among some tribes; and that the facility is increasing, for extending that divided and individual ownership, which exists now in movable property only, to the soil itself; and of thus establishing, in the culture and improvement of it, the true foundation for a transit from the habits of the savage, to the arts and comforts of social life.

As a subject of the highest importance to the national welfare, I must, again, earnestly recommend to the consideration of Congress, a re-organization of the Militia, on a plan which will form it into classes, according to the periods of life more and less adapted to military services. An efficient militia is authorized and contemplated by the Constitution, and required by the spirit and safety of free Government. The present organization of our militia is universally regarded as less efficient than it ought to be made; and no organization can be better calculated to give to it its due force, than a classification which will assign the foremost place in the defence of the country, to that portion of its citizens, whose activity and animation best enable them to rally to its standard. Besides, the consideration that a time of peace is the time when the change can be made with most convenience and equity, it will now be aided by the experience of a recent war, in which the militia bore so interesting a part.

Congress will call to mind, that no adequate provision has yet been made, for the uniformity of weights and measures, also contemplated by the Constitution. The great utility of a standard, fixed in its nature, and founded on the easy rule of decimal proportions, is sufficiently obvious. It led the Government, at an early stage, to preparatory steps for introducing it; and a completion of the work will be a just title to the public gratitude.

The importance which I have attached to the establishment of a University within this District, on a scale, and for objects worthy of the American nation, induces me to renew my recommendation of it to the favorable consideration of Congress. And I particularly invite, again, their attention to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, by promoting intercourse and improvements, and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity.

Occurrences having taken place which show that the statutory provisions for the dispensation of criminal justice are deficient, in relation both to places and to persons, under the exclusive cognizance of the national authority, an amendment of the law, embracing such cases, will merit the earliest attention of the Legislature. It will be a seasonable occasion, also, for inquiring how far Legislative interposition may be further requisite in providing penalties for offences designated in the Constitution or in the statutes, and to which either no penalties are annexed, or none with sufficient certainty. And I submit to the wisdom of Congress, whether a more enlarged revival of the criminal code be not expedient, for the purpose of mitigating, in certain cases, penalties which were adopted into it, antecedent to experiment and examples which justify and recommend a more lenient policy.

The United States, having been the first to abolish, within the extent of their authority, the transportation of the natives of Africa into slavery, by prohibiting the introduction of slaves, and by punishing their citizens participating in the traffic, cannot but be gratified at the progress, made by concurrent efforts of other nations, towards a general suppression of so great an evil. They must feel, at the same time, the greater solicitude to give the fullest efficacy to their own regulations. With that view, the interposition of Congress appears to be required by the violations and evasions which, it is suggested, are chargeable on unworthy citizens, who mingle in the slave trade under foreign flags, and with foreign ports; and by collusive importations of slaves into the United States, through adjoining ports and territories. I present the subject to Congress with a full assurance of their disposition to apply all the remedy which can be afforded by an amendment of the law. The regulations which were intended to guard against abuses of a kindred character, in the trade between the several States, ought also to be rendered more effectual for their humane object.

To these recommendations I add, for the consideration of Congress, the expediency of a re-modification of the Judiciary establishment, and of an additional department in the Executive branch of the Government.

The first is called for by the accruing business which necessarily swells the duties of the Federal Courts; and by the great and widening space, within which justice is to be dispensed by them. The time seems to have arrived which claims for members of the Supreme Court a relief from itinerary fatigues, incompatible as well with the age which a portion of them will always have attained, as with the researches and preparations which are due to their stations, and to the juridical reputation of their country. And considerations equally cogent require a more convenient organization of the subordinate tribunals, which may be accomplished without an objectionable increase of the number or expense of the judges.

The extent and variety of Executive business, also accumulating with the progress of our country and its growing population, call for an additional department, to be charged with duties now overburdening other departments, and with such as have not been annexed to any department.

The course of experience recommends, as another improvement in the Executive establishment, that the provision for the station of Attorney General, whose residence at the Seat of Government, official connexions with it, and management of the public business before the Judiciary, preclude an extensive participation in professional emoluments, be made more adequate to his services and his relinquishments; and that, with a view to his reasonable accommodation, and to a proper depository of his official opinions and proceedings, there be included in the provision the usual appurtenances to a public office.

In directing the Legislative attention to the state of the finances, it is a subject of great gratification to find, that, even within the short period which has elapsed since the return of peace, the revenue has far exceeded all the current demands upon the Treasury, and that, under any probable diminution of its future annual products, which the vicissitudes of commerce may occasion, it will afford an ample fund for the effectual and early extinguishment of the public debt. It has been estimated, that during the year 1816, the actual receipts of revenue at the Treasury, including the balance at the commencement of the year, and excluding the proceeds of loans and Treasury notes, will amount to about the sum of forty-seven millions of dollars; that during the same year, the actual payments at the Treasury, including the payment of the arrearages of the War Department, as well as the payment of a considerable excess, beyond the annual appropriations, will amount to about the sum of thirty-eight millions of dollars; and that, consequently, at the close of the year, there will be a surplus in the Treasury of about the sum of nine millions of dollars.

The operations of the Treasury continue to be obstructed by difficulties, arising from the condition of the national currency; but they have, nevertheless, been effectual, to a beneficial extent, in the reduction of the public debt, and the establishment of the public credit. The floating debt, of Treasury notes and temporary loans, will soon be entirely discharged. The aggregate of the funded debt, composed of debts incurred during the wars of 1776 and 1812, has been estimated, with reference to the first of January next, at a sum not exceeding one hundred and ten millions of dollars. The ordinary annual expenses of the Government, for the maintenance of all its institutions, civil, military, and naval, have been estimated at a sum less than twenty millions of dollars. And the permanent revenue, to be derived from all the existing sources, has been estimated at a sum of about twenty-five millions of dollars.

Upon this general view of the subject, it is obvious, that there is only wanting, to the fiscal prosperity of the Government, the restoration of an uniform medium of exchange. The resources and the faith of the nation, displayed in the system which Congress has established, insure respect and confidence both at home and abroad. The local accumulations of the revenue have already enabled the Treasury to meet the public engagements in the local currency of most of the States; and it is expected that the same cause will produce the same effect throughout the Union. But, for the interests of the community at large, as well as for the purposes of the Treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit, and use, wherever it may circulate. The Constitution has intrusted Congress, exclusively, with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description; and the measures which were taken during the last session, in execution of the power, give every promise of success. The Bank of the United States has been organized under auspices the most favorable, and cannot fail to be an important auxiliary to those measures.

For a more enlarged view of the public finances, with a view of the measures pursued by the Treasury Department, previous to the resignation of the late Secretary, I transmit an extract from the last report of that officer. Congress will perceive in it ample proofs of the solid foundation on which the financial prosperity of the nation rests; and will do justice to the distinguished ability and successful exertions with which the duties of the department were executed, during a period remarkable for its difficulties and its peculiar perplexities.

The period of my retiring from the public service being at little distance, I shall find no occasion more proper than the present for expressing to my fellow-citizens my deep sense of the continued confidence and kind support which I have received from them. My grateful recollection of these distinguished marks of their favorable regard can never cease; and, with the consciousness, that if I have not served my country with greater ability, I have served it with a sincere devotion, will accompany me as a source of unfailing gratification.

Happily, I shall carry with me from the public theatre, other sources, which those who love their country most, will best appreciate. I shall behold it blessed with tranquillity and prosperity at home, and with peace and respect abroad. I can indulge the proud reflection, that the American people have reached, in safety and success, their fortieth year as an independent nation; that, for nearly an entire generation, they have had experience of their present Constitution, the offspring of their undisturbed deliberations and of their free choice; that they have found it to bear the trials of adverse as well as prosperous circumstances; to contain, in its combination of the federate and elective principles, a reconciliation of public strength with individual liberty, of national power for the defence of national rights, with a security against wars of injustice, of ambition, and of vain glory, in the fundamental provision which subjects all questions of war to the will of the nation itself, which is to pay its cost and feel its calamities. Nor is it less a peculiar felicity of this Constitution, so dear to us all, that it is found to be capable, without losing its vital energies, of expanding itself over a spacious territory, with the increase and expansion of the community for whose benefit it was established.

And may I not be allowed to add to this gratifying spectacle, that I shall read in the character of the American people, in their devotion to true liberty, and to the Constitution which is its palladium, sure presages, that the destined career of my country will exhibit a Government pursuing the public good as its sole object, and regulating its means by the great principles consecrated in its charter, and by those moral principles to which they are so well allied: A Government which watches over the purity of elections, the freedom of speech and of the press, the trial by jury, and the equal interdict against encroachments and compacts between religion and the State; which maintains inviolably the maxims of public faith, the security of persons and property, and encourages, in every authorized mode, that general diffusion of knowledge which guarantees to public liberty its permanency, and to those who possess the blessing, the true enjoyment of it: A Government which avoids intrusions on the internal repose of other nations, and repels them from its own; which does justice to all nations with a readiness equal to the firmness with which it requires justice from them; and which, while it refines its domestic code from every ingredient not congenial with the precepts of an enlightened age, and the sentiments of a virtuous people, seeks, by appeals to reason, and by its liberal examples, to infuse, into the law which governs the civilized world, a spirit which may diminish the frequency, or circumscribe the calamities of war, and meliorate the social and beneficent relations of peace: A Government, in a word, whose conduct, within and without, may bespeak the most noble of all ambitions—that of promoting peace on earth, and good will to man.

These contemplations, sweetening the remnant of my days, will animate my prayers for the happiness of my beloved country, and a perpetuity of the institutions under which it is enjoyed.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 3, 1816.

The Message and accompanying documents were read, and two thousand copies of the Message ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 4.

The resolution for the appointment of Chaplains was read a third time and passed, as follows:

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. VARNUM submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish a competent office of discount and deposit within the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution authorizing Mountjoy Bayly to employ one assistant and two horses, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Indiana into the Union, or for extending the laws of the United States to that State, made report, which was read, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the State of Indiana, having formed to themselves a constitution and State government, conformable to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to the principles of the articles of compact between the original States, and the people and States to be formed in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787, the said State shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

Ordered, That said resolution pass to the second reading.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. SANFORD submitted the following motions for consideration:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to foreign affairs, be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

2. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to manufactures, be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

THURSDAY, December 5.

DUDLEY CHACE, from the State of Vermont; WILLIAM HUNTER, from the State of Rhode Island; JONATHAN ROBERTS, from the State of Pennsylvania; and JAMES BROWN, from the State of Louisiana, severally took their seats in the Senate, all of whom arrived on the 4th instant.

MARTIN D. HARDIN, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Kentucky, in place of William T. Barry, resigned. (who arrived on the 4th instant.) produced his credentials, was qualified, and he took his seat in the Senate.

The resolution authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms to employ one assistant and two horses, was read a third time and passed.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Robert Kidd, of the city of Philadelphia, praying relief for an alleged forfeiture under the non-importation laws, as stated in the petition, which was read, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. ROBERTS, BROWN, and HOWELL, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW, the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Indiana into the Union, or for extending the laws of the United States to that State, was recommitted to the same committee, further to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration, which was twice read by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That it shall be one of the rules of the Senate that the following standing committees be appointed at each session:

A Committee on Foreign Relations.

A Committee on Ways and Means.

A Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

A Committee on Military Affairs.

A Committee on the Militia.

A Committee on Naval Affairs.

A Committee on Public Lands.

A Committee of Claims.

A Committee on the Judiciary.

A Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

A Committee on Pensions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of requiring the establishment of a competent office of discount and deposit within the city of Washington.

On motion, by Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday week.

On motion, the further consideration of the motions for referring the Message of the President of the United States to select committees was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 6.

WILLIAM H. WELLS, from the State of Delaware, who arrived on the 5th instant, took his seat in the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

The 9th section of the act, passed at the last session of Congress, "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," having received a construction giving to it a scope of great and uncertain extent, I thought it proper that proceedings relative to claims under that part of the act should be suspended, until Congress should have an opportunity of defining, more precisely, the cases contemplated by them. With that view, I now recommend the subject to their consideration. They will have an opportunity, at the same time, of considering how far other provisions of the act may be rendered more clear and precise in their import.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 6, 1816.

On motion, by Mr. SANFORD, the consideration of the motions of the 4th instant for referring the Message of the President of the United States to select committees, was further postponed until Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. VARNUM, the Senate proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain on their part; and, on the ballots having been counted, it appeared that the Reverend JOHN GLENDY had a majority, and was elected.

ADMISSION OF INDIANA.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Indiana into the Union, or for extending the laws of the United States to that State, to whom was recommitted their report on that subject, reported the resolution for admitting the State of Indiana into the Union, with amendments, which were read and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the resolution to the House amended accordingly.

On the question "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The said resolution having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read a third time by unanimous consent, as follows:

Whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress, passed on the 19th day of April, 1816, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of that State into the Union," the people of the said Territory did, on the 29th day of June, in the present year, by a convention called for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government so formed is republican, and in conformity with the principles of the articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the territory northwest of the river Ohio, passed on the 13th day, of July 1787:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Indiana shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

ROADS AND CANALS.

The Senate went into the consideration of the motion to amend the rules of the Senate, by ordering the appointment, at each session, of standing committees on the regular subjects of legislation, instead of providing select committees for every occasion requiring the reference of a subject.

A motion made by Mr. BARBOUR, to add to the number a standing committee on the subject of roads and canals, gave rise to some debate.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. MASON of New Hampshire, and DAGGETT, on the ground that, except the Cumberland road, the United States possesses neither roads nor canals, on which to legislate; that it was not a regular and permanent subject for the consideration of Congress; that it had not yet even been decided that the United States had a Constitutional jurisdiction over roads and canals, and that under this doubt, the extension of their Constitutional powers on the subject had been suggested, &c.

Mr. BARBOUR replied, that his motion proceeded from his impressions of the importance of roads and canals to the welfare and prosperity of the Republic; that it was, moreover, a subject repeatedly recommended to their consideration by the President of the United States; that though, except in the single road mentioned, the United States possessed neither roads nor canals, on which to legislate, his object was to provide for their creation, and with that view, he wished the subject to be referred to a permanent committee, to deliberate and regularly report thereon; that there was a universal sentiment in the country in favor of these great objects of domestic improvement; and that, whatever doubts might exist as to the Constitutional power of Congress to legislate on the subject, the States would never urge that objection, but would always cordially co-operate in objects so promotive of their advantage and convenience, &c. He was not, however, anxious to press the subject at this time, in the way he had proposed, in opposition to the wishes of gentlemen, and would therefore withdraw his motion.

On motion, by Mr. MASON of New Hampshire, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

MONDAY, December 9.

ISHAM TALBOT, from the State of Kentucky, arrived on the 6th instant, and GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from the State of Tennessee, arrived on the 7th, and severally attended this day.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion for amending the rules of the Senate so as to appoint at each session certain standing committees; and on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, it having been amended, on the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. SANFORD, the consideration of the motions of the 4th instant, for referring the Message of the President of the United States to select committees, was further postponed until to-morrow.

On motion, by Mr. VARNUM, that the Message from the President of the United States, of the 6th instant, relative to the act "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon.

On motion, by Mr. LACOCK, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. BARBOUR gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relative to the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 2d instant, relative to the repeal of the compensation law.

On motion, by Mr. TAIT, to amend the same by striking out from the word "That," in the 1st line, the remainder of the resolution, and inserting in lieu thereof, "a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the law passed the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Delegates from Territories,'" with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 5, as follows:

PUBLIC OFFICES.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, of the 20th of April last, requiring the Secretaries of the Departments to report jointly to the Senate, in the first week of the next session of Congress, a plan to insure the annual settlement of the public accounts, and a more certain accountability of the public expenditure in their respective Departments; and the report was read.—It is as follows:

In obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the 20th of April last, requiring the Secretaries of the Departments to report jointly to the Senate, in the first week of the next session of Congress, a plan to insure the annual settlement of the public accounts, and a more certain accountability of the public expenditure in their respective Departments: the undersigned have the honor to report—

That, in order to comply with the requisitions of the resolution, and to satisfy the just expectations of the Senate, it is necessary to inquire into the causes of the delay of the annual settlement of accounts, and the want of sufficient certainty in the accountability of the respective Departments, upon which the resolution is predicated.

An attentive review of the principles upon which the several Departments of the Government were originally organized, and of the changes which have successively been made in that organization, appears to be necessary at the threshold of this investigation.

By referring to the laws for organizing the several Departments of the Government, they will be found to be extremely general in their terms, leaving the distribution of the duties, and powers of the Secretaries, in a considerable degree to Executive regulation. The law organizing the Treasury Department, however, specifically refers to that Department the settlement of all public accounts. The pecuniary embarrassments by which the Government was pressed at that period, requiring a system of the most rigid economy in the public disbursements, could not fail to give peculiar force to the idea that the Department charged with the replenishment of the Treasury should have a direct control over the public expenditure. Under the influence of this idea, all purchases for supplying the army with provisions, clothing, supplies, in the Quartermaster's department, military stores, Indian goods, and all other supplies or articles for the use of the War Department, were, by Executive regulation, directed to be made by the Treasury Department.

The first important change which was made in the organization of the War Department, was effected by the act of the 8th of May, 1792, which created the office of accountant of that Department, and referred to that officer the settlement of all accounts relative to the pay of the Army, the subsistence of the officers, bounties to soldiers, expenses of the recruiting service, and the incidental and contingent expenses of the Department. The accounts settled by the accountant were to be certified quarterly, and sent to the accounting officers of the Treasury for their revision. This act continues with the Treasury Department the power of making, for the War Department, the purchases before enumerated.

On the 30th of April, 1798, the Navy Department was created. From the organization of the Government to this date, the Secretary of War executed the orders of the President in relation to the Navy. On the 16th of July, in the same year, the office of Accountant of the Navy was created, and the settlement of all accounts in the Navy Department was referred to that office. On the same day the power of the Treasury Department to make contracts for the War Department was rescinded, and all the accounts of that Department were, thereforward, settled by the accountant.

The power of revision, both as to the accounts of the War and Navy Departments, was, and still is, reserved to the accounting officers of the Treasury. This power, however, from the period of the primary settlement of the accounts of the War and Navy Department, was withdrawn from the Treasury, ceased to be useful, and has been preserved merely for the sake of form. In the Treasury, balances or debts admitted on settlement, are paid only upon the report of the Auditor, confirmed by the Comptroller, whose decision is final. In the War and Navy Departments, the sums reported by the accountants to be due to individuals, are paid without waiting for the revision of the accounting officers of the Treasury. This practice, which has been adopted in some measure from necessity, is not believed to be incompatible with the provisions of the law requiring that revision. The Accountants of the War and Navy Departments are required to transmit quarterly all the accounts, which have been settled, to the Treasury Department for final revision. It could not have been the intention of Congress that an officer or an individual, to whom money was found to be due, by the report of the Accountant of either of those Departments, should wait for payment not only until the expiration of the charter, but until his accounts should be re-examined by the Auditor of the Treasury, and also by the Comptroller.

The delays to which this course would necessarily have led, must have produced a state of confusion, which, in a short period, could not have failed to have obstructed all the operations of the Government. On the other hand, it is manifest, that from the moment payments were made upon the settlement of the accountants, before the revisionary power of the Treasury officers was exercised, revision became useless. The leading feature of the organic laws of the Departments, that the settlement of the public accounts should exclusively rest with the Department, which was charged with the replenishment of the Treasury, was substantially abandoned. The form, indeed, was preserved, but the vital principle was extinguished.

It is probable that more importance was attached to this principle, by those who presided over the primary organization of the Departments, than it intrinsically merits. The power of the accounting officers, whether belonging to the Treasury Department, or to those in which the disbursements are made, to enforce economy in any branch of the public service, must necessarily be extremely limited.

In disbursements for the pay, subsistence, and clothing of the Army, while rations are furnished by contracts, the most rigid economy may be easily enforced. In the Quartermaster's department, and where provisions are supplied by a commissariat, the accounting officers can exercise but a very limited control. The principal reliance of the Government for economy, in those Departments, must be upon the integrity of the persons employed. Over the contingent disbursements of the War and Navy Departments, which, in time of war, are considerable, and which, in all Governments, are extremely liable to abuse, the accounting officers have still less control. For economy in that branch of the public service, the heads of those Departments must be responsible to the nation. From this view of the subject, it appears not to be so important that the public accounts should be settled in the Treasury Department, as that they should be promptly and finally settled.

Whatever diversity of opinion may exist upon this subject, it is believed, that there can be none upon the propriety of either returning to the principle upon which the Departments were originally organized, of referring the settlement of all public accounts immediately to the Treasury Department, or of finally settling the accounts of the War and Navy Departments without the intervention of the accounting officers of the Treasury. The former has the recommendation of unity and simplicity in theory; and, it is believed, that no serious inconvenience will result from it in practice. The latter would insure the prompt and final settlement of the accounts of the several Departments, but might, possibly, lead to the establishment of different principles in the settlement of the public accounts in the respective Departments. Under judicious regulations, it is believed that the prompt and final settlement of the public accounts may be as effectually secured by the former, as by the latter modification.

Whichever modification may be adopted, an increase in the number of the accounting officers appears to be indispensable. From the year 1792, when the office of Accountant of the War Department was created, to the year 1798, when all the accounts of the War Department were referred for settlement to that officer, the military force of the United States was not so extensive as the present Military Peace Establishment. The duties assigned the Accountant at the former period was, as has been already stated, the settlement of all accounts relative to the pay of the Army, the subsistence of officers, bounties to soldiers, expenses of the recruiting service, and the contingent expenses of the War Department. The services required by that act, are believed to be sufficient to give full employment to one accounting officer. By the act of 1798, the settlement of the accounts relative to the subsistence of the Army, the Quartermaster's department, the clothing department, the purchase of arms and munitions of war, and to the Indian Department, were referred to the Accountant of the War Department.

The additional duties imposed upon the Accountant by this act have been so great, that some of the accounts of the War Department, nearly of the same date, remain still unsettled. It is, therefore, confidently believed, that the duties imposed upon the Accountant, by this act, require the undivided attention of another accounting officer.

In contemplation of the law, the Comptroller of the Treasury revises all the accounts of the Government, for the purpose of correcting the errors, both of fact and of law, which may have been committed by the accounting officers, to whom their settlement is, in the first instance, committed. He is likewise charged with the superintendence of the collection of the revenue arising from duties and tonnage, and directs the collection, by suit, of all debts due to the United States. It has been already stated, that the revision of the accounts settled by the accountants of the War and Navy Departments, by this officer, has always been merely nominal. The enumeration just given of the extent and variety of the duties imposed upon him, will satisfy every reflecting mind that they must continue to be so. Should this officer be relieved from the superintendence of the collection of imposts and duties, and of suits for the recovery of debts due the United States, by the assignment of those duties to another officer, still, it is believed, he would not be able to revise all the accounts of the Government, so as to be, in fact, the check upon the auditing officers which the law contemplates. When the office of Comptroller was created, and the duties of that officer prescribed, the Auditor of the Treasury was the only accounting officer whose acts he had to revise. At present, he has to revise the settlements made by three accounting officers; and according to the plan which it is the duty of the undersigned to propose, in order to insure the annual settlement of the public accounts, there will be five auditing or accounting officers, whose acts are to be revised. From this view of the subject, the appointment of an additional Comptroller appears to be indispensable.

It has been previously stated that the mass of business thrown upon the Accountant of the War Department, by the act of the 16th of July, 1798, has produced an arrearage in the settlement of the accounts of that Department, almost coeval with that date. This observation was intended to apply to the accounts appropriately belonging to the Department, arising from the administration of the Military Establishment. But the accounts of the Indian Department, without a solitary exception, have remained unsettled from that date to the present period. This has resulted from the fact, that the Secretary of War is substantially the auditor of all the Indian accounts. It is also his duty to inquire into and decide upon all claims exhibited by the citizens of the United States for property stolen or destroyed by the Indian tribes, to whom annuities are payable, and where they are proved to his satisfaction, to direct compensation to be made to the injured party, out of the annuity payable to the offending tribe. These duties, together with the examination of the contingent expenses of the Department, which must also receive his special sanction, if duly attended to, would leave him no time to devote to the more important and appropriate duties of his station. The consequence has been, that the Indian accounts have remained unsettled, and must continue so, until a different organization of the Department shall be effected.

It is obvious, to the mind of every reflecting man, that the duties imposed upon the Secretary of War, in relation to the Indian department, have no rational connexion with the administration of the military establishment. From the view that has been presented, it is conceived that the public interest requires that the Secretary of War should be relieved from further attention to those duties. It then becomes necessary to inquire whether those duties can, consistently with the public interest, be assigned to either of the other departments. An examination into the duties required of those departments, it is confidently believed, cannot fail to produce the most decided conviction, that no additional duties ought to be imposed upon them, under their present organization. On the other hand, there is good reason to believe that the public interest would be promoted by relieving those departments of several branches of the public service, at present committed to their respective charges.

The retrenchments which, with great advantage to the public interest, might be made in the duties now imposed upon the Secretaries of the respective departments, and the General Post Office, would furnish ample employment for the head of another independent department.

An appropriate assignment of duties to the chief of the new department, would embrace the Territorial Governments, the Indian department, the General Post Office, roads and canals, and the Patent Office, and such other branches of the public service as may be deemed expedient.

But the defects in organization of the existing departments, are not the only reasons why the public accounts are not annually settled.

The want of power to compel those to whom the collection, or disbursement of the public money has been confided, to render their vouchers and settle their accounts, when required, has largely contributed to swell the list of unsettled accounts. The power of dismissing from office for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office, especially with the collecting officers, is sufficiently coercive, as long as the conduct of the officer will bear examination, and powerfully contributes to keep him in the line of his duty. But when the settlement of his accounts must expose his guilt, and especially when he has been dismissed from office, this coercion entirely ceases. With disbursing officers, and particularly in the Military Establishment, this mode of coercion is much more feeble. In that department, too, there is the strongest reason for the adoption of the most vigorous measures to bring to a prompt and final settlement those who have been intrusted with the disbursement of money, particularly in the Quartermaster's and Paymaster's department. Until the accounts of the Quartermaster General of an army, or of a military district, are settled, it is impossible to settle the accounts of the deputies and assistants, the barrackmasters, foragemasters' and quartermasters, employed with the same army, or in the same district. The same observation applies to the pay departments. Until the deputy paymaster general settles his accounts, or at least until he renders his vouchers, none of the district, assistant district paymasters, or regimental paymasters, can settle their accounts. This observation applies to the several grades in both Departments. Thus a single officer, who knows himself to be a public defaulter, may, by standing aloof, and by procrastinating the decision of law, after suit is brought, prevent, for years, the settlement of the accounts of other officers, who may be solicitous to adjust them.

It is the peculiar province of the Legislature to apply appropriate remedies for every evil, disclosed by the practical operations of the Government. The one now under consideration, taken in connexion with the inability of the accounting officers, to settle annually the public accounts, has produced more serious consequences to the National Treasury, than every other united. The conviction, on the part of an officer, that his accounts, cannot, or will not, be settled for years, presents a certain degree of impunity to embezzlement, and powerfully tempts to the commission of it. The necessity of resorting to an action at law to enforce the settlement of accounts, or to recover money embezzled by an officer, ought to be avoided, if it can be done consistently with the provisions of the Constitution. In some of the States this necessity is avoided, the public money retained by a revenue officer, being collected by execution issued by the State treasurer. If this or a similar principle could be acted upon by the United States, embezzlement would not be frequent.

In conformity with these preliminary observations, the undersigned respectfully propose, that it is expedient—

First. That another independent Department of the Government be organized to be denominated the "Home Department."

That the Secretary of this Department shall execute the orders of the President in relation to,

1. The Territorial governments.
2. The National Highways and Canals.
3. The General Post Office.
4. The Patent Office.
5. The Indian Department.

Second. That the primary and final settlement of all accounts be made in the Treasury Department, and that the organization of that Department be modified, so as to authorize the appointment of

1. Four additional Auditors.
2. One additional Comptroller.
3. One Solicitor.
4. That the Mint Establishment be placed under the direction of the Treasury Department.

Third. That the office of Accountant of the War and Navy Department, and of the Superintendent General of Military Supplies, be abolished.

Fourth. That the survey of the coast be confided to the Navy Department.

According to the modification here recommended, the

First Auditor will be charged with the settlement of the public accounts, accruing in the Treasury Department.

Second Auditor will be charged with the settlement of all accounts relative to the pay and clothing of the Army, the subsistence of the officers, bounties and premiums, the recruiting service, and the contingent expenses of the War Department.

Third Auditor will be charged with the settlement of all accounts, relative to the Army, the Quartermaster's department, the Hospital department, and the Ordnance department. Both of these Auditors will keep the property account connected with those branches of service, in the War Department, confided to them, respectively.

Fourth Auditor will be charged with the settlement of all accounts relative to the Navy Department. And the Fifth Auditor will be charged with the settlement of all accounts relative to the State and Home departments.

The First Comptroller being relieved from directing and superintending the recovery by suits of all debts due the Government, will revise all accounts settled by the First and Fifth Auditor.

Second Comptroller will revise all settlements made by the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors.

The Solicitor of the Treasury will be charged with the recovery of the debts due the Government, according to the forms prescribed by law.

It is probable that experience will suggest the propriety of making changes in the distribution of duties among the accounting officers of the Treasury. In order that they may be done with facility, and as they shall be discovered to be necessary, it is respectfully recommended that the whole subject be left to Executive regulation.

With this organization of the Departments, the check contemplated by the revision of the Comptroller will be as effectual as it can be made. Money will then be paid in all the Departments upon the settlement of an auditor, only after it has been revised and approved by a comptroller.

If the Departments should be thus organized and vested with sufficient power to compel all officers employed in the collection or disbursement of the public money to render their vouchers and settle their accounts, the annual settlement of the public accounts will be insured, and a more certain accountability established in the respective Departments.

If the officer intrusted with the recovery of money improperly detained by public officers was authorized to issue an execution for the sum appearing to be due, either upon settlement or upon the failure to settle, when called upon for that purpose; and that the execution so issued should be satisfied by the distress and sale of all the delinquent's property, and that of his securities, one of the most formidable obstacles to the annual settlement of the public accounts would be surmounted.

It is believed that there is no Constitutional objection to the adoption of the principle, in relation to the officers of the Government, who improperly withhold the public money. Under the law imposing the direct tax, the collector, on default of payment, is authorized to make the amount due by the levy and sale of the defaulter's property. In this case there is, on the part of the defaulter, nothing but a breach of the general implied obligation, which every citizen owes to the community, to contribute to the wants of the State, in proportion to the property which he possesses. This breach may frequently be the result of inevitable necessity, and but seldom brings his integrity in question. In the case of the delinquent officer, there is, in most cases, a direct breach of special confidence, involving the odious charge of peculation or embezzlement. Is there any reason why the remedy of the Government should be more summary in the former than in the latter case? Is there not, on the contrary, a clear distinction between the two cases, entirely in favor of the tax defaulter? Can it be considered more important to the community that the revenue should be rigidly collected, than that it should be faithfully and honestly disbursed? Has the difference in the remedy arisen from the consideration, that the one has withheld from the Government a hundred cents, which he ought to have paid, whilst the other has embezzled a thousand dollars of the public money, thus summarily collected?

There can be no doubt that the different remedies in the two cases have resulted from the want of sufficient reflection, and not from design. The subject is now presented to the view of the Senate, and no doubt is entertained that that enlightened body will satisfy the demands of reason and justice. It may be proper to observe, that the principle now recommended has been applied by the laws laying direct taxes to the collectors of the internal revenue. The Legislature, in relation to that class of officers, has even authorized the arrest and imprisonment of collectors who fail to collect, or neglect to pay after collection; and the seizure and sale of the property, real and personal, of his securities during their imprisonment. As the principle has already been applied to cases arising out of the collection of the revenue, it is respectfully conceived that reasons more cogent call for its application to the disbursing officers of the Government. The different rules established in relation to those two classes of officers, if persevered in, cannot fail to present the idea, that the Government is more astute in devising means to raise and collect revenue, than in enforcing a faithful application of it, when collected.

Hon. JOHN GAILLARD,

President pro tem. of the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 10.

Mr. WILLIAMS called up the petition of Alfred M. Carter, of Tennessee, on behalf of himself and the other heirs of his deceased father, Landon Carter, praying payment for an unliquidated loan-office certificate for five hundred dollars, as stated in the petition; which was read.

The resolution for the appointment of standing committees was read a third time and passed, as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be one of the rules of the Senate that the following standing committees be appointed at each session.

A Committee on Foreign Relations.

A Committee on Finance.

A Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

A Committee on Military Affairs.

A Committee on the Militia.

A Committee on Naval Affairs.

A Committee on Public Lands.

A Committee of Claims.

A Committee on the Judiciary.

A Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and

A Committee on Pensions.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BARBOUR asked and obtained leave to bring in the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution: No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Ordered, That it pass to the second reading.

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 11.

Mr. VARNUM communicated the instructions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to their Senators in Congress, to use their influence to effect the repeal of the act, passed the nineteenth day of March last, changing the mode and increasing the compensation of members of Congress; which were read.

Mr. VARNUM withdrew his motion for referring to a select committee the Message of the President of the United States, of the 5th instant, relative to the act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes.

The resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, relative to the compensation of members of Congress, was read a second time, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BARBOUR, ROBERTS, DAGGETT, MASON, of New Hampshire, and BROWN, were appointed the committee.

THURSDAY, December 12.

ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the State of Maryland, arrived on the 11th, and attended this day.

GEORGE M. TROUP, (who arrived on the 11th instant,) appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of William W. Bibb, produced his credentials, was qualified, and he took his seat in the Senate.

The credentials of GEORGE M. TROUP, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March next, were also read, and laid on file.

The oath prescribed by law was administered to JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, respectively, appointed Senators by the Legislature of the State of Indiana; their credentials having been read and filed on the 2d instant, they took their seats in the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators of the State of Indiana shall be inserted, in conformity to the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW,

Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box three papers, of equal size, numbered 1, 2, and 3; each of the said Senators shall draw out one paper. No. 1, if drawn, shall entitle the member to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d of March, 1817; No. 2, in the class whose terms will expire on the 3d of March, 1819; and No. 3, in the class whose terms will expire on the 3d of March, 1821.

Whereupon, the numbers abovementioned were, by the Secretary, rolled up and put into the box; when Mr. NOBLE drew No. 3, and is accordingly of the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d of March, 1821; and Mr. TAYLOR drew No. 2, and is accordingly of the class whose terms of service will expire on the 3d of March, 1819.

FRIDAY, December 13.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathaniel Williams," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read and passed to the second reading.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate proceeded to the appointment of the following Standing Committees, agreeably to the resolution of the 10th instant. And,

Messrs. Barbour, Macon, King, Dana, and Lacroix, were appointed the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Messrs. Campbell, Mason, of New Hampshire, Thompson, King, and Troup, were appointed the Committee on Finance.

Messrs. Hunter, Sanford, Roberts, and Mason, of New Hampshire, were appointed the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Messrs. Williams, Mason, of Virginia, Troup, Condit, and Hardin, were appointed the Committee on Military Affairs.

Messrs. Varnum, Tichenor, Lacroix, Mason, of Virginia, and Williams, were appointed the Committee on the Militia.

Messrs. Tait, Howell, Sanford, Fromentin, and Daggett, were appointed the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Messrs. Morrow, Brown, Taylor, Noble, and Goldsborough, were appointed the Committee on Public Lands.

Messrs. Roberts, Wilson, Goldsborough, Tichenor, and Mason, of Virginia, were appointed the Committee of Claims.

Messrs. Chace, Talbot, Hunter, and Tait, were appointed the Committee on the Judiciary.

Messrs. Wilson, Ashmun, Thompson, Talbot, and Chace, were appointed the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads: And, Messrs. Howell, Varnum, Condit, Wells, and Roberts, were appointed the Committee on Pensions.

REFERENCE OF THE MESSAGE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions of the 4th instant, for referring the Message of the President of the United States to select committees, which, having been amended, were agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to foreign affairs, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

FRIDAY, December 27.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

It is found that the existing laws have not the efficacy necessary to prevent violations of the obligations of the United States, as a nation at peace, towards belligerent parties, and other unlawful acts on the high seas, by armed vessels equipped within the waters of the United States.

With a view to maintain more effectually the respect due to the laws, to the character, and to the neutral and pacific relations of the United States, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of such further legislative provisions as may be requisite for detaining vessels actually equipped, or in a course of equipment, with a warlike force, within the jurisdiction of the United States; or, as the case may be, for obtaining from the owners or commanders of such vessels, adequate securities against the abuse of their armaments, with the exceptions, in such provisions, proper for the cases of merchant vessels furnished with the defensive armaments usual on distant and dangerous expeditions; and of a private commerce in military stores permitted by our law, and which the law of nations does not require the United States to prohibit.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 26, 1816.

The Message was read, and, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of James

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 30th instant, to proceed on Thursday next to the appointment of an Assistant Door-keeper; and agreed thereto.

Mr. SANFORD submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, uniform rates of damages and interest, in cases of protests of foreign bills of exchange.

Mr. NOBLE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the division of a certain proportion of the quarter sections of the public lands.

MARITIME PRECINCTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. DANA's motion to instruct the Committee of Foreign Relations to consider the propriety of making provision, by law, for declaring the extent of the maritime precincts of the United States, and for the safeguard of friendly vessels, which may be within the same.

Mr. DANA offered a few remarks on the necessity of instituting the inquiry he proposed. One of the first and most interesting processions which ever took place in this country, he said, occurred at New York, on the death of an American citizen, killed by a British vessel within the waters of the United States—he alluded to the case of Pierce, who was shot within a mile, even in sight, of the shore; yet, on that occasion, the question arose whether the act was committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, and was tried before a British naval court. From that time to this no effectual attempt had been made to adopt measures of protection, or to prevent the recurrence of such outrages—he meant no legislative attempt, where alone it was proper. He did not allude to negotiation, or any Executive measures; nor did he conceive it the business of the Executive, under our Constitution, to meddle with the subject; our Executive could not, like the King of England, make any regulations regarding our jurisdiction. Mr. D. said, in England, they did not confine their jurisdiction to one league from shore; nor did they limit it by law; they measured their jurisdiction by their cannon—by cannon afloat; and more than a century ago the English had taken the proper steps to protect their honor from insult. Mr. D. called the recollection of the Senate to a correspondence on this subject, under the Administration of General WASHINGTON, which might readily be referred to, when it was decided that it was not prudent to claim jurisdiction beyond one league from land. It was, Mr. D. thought, consistent now with our character, and the situation of our country, that our jurisdiction should not be confined to a marine league. Very often, when our vessels were coasting and passing the headlands, they were more than a league from shore, yet would any one consider them beyond the pale of our protection? No, he said, they were still within the limits of our court-yard, though it might not be enclosed, and it was our business to prevent any disturbance there. The proper peace-officers of that yard were the officers of our navy, who were able and willing to preserve peace there.

The resolution was then agreed to nem. con.

The Senate adjourned to Thursday.

THURSDAY, January 2, 1817.

ALEXANDER CONTEE HANSON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Robert G. Harper, produced his credentials, was qualified, and he took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, containing the information required, concerning the progress made in surveying military bounty lands, and the report was read.

The Senate went into the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. SANFORD, on Tuesday, to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, uniform rates of damages and interest in cases of protests of foreign bills of exchange.

Mr. SANFORD submitted a few remarks to show the competency of the Government to regulate the amount of protests in the cases specified in the resolution, and the necessity of providing some uniform rule on a subject which varied now so much in the different courts of the Union; after which the resolution was agreed to without objection.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 31st ultimo, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the division of a certain proportion of the quarter sections of the public lands; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee, on the petition of Robert Kidd; and on motion by Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next, and the petition, and accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Indiana, was read the second time; and, on motion by Mr. CHACE, the further consideration thereof was postponed until next Monday week.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of regimental and battalion paymasters, and giving them rank in the Army of the United States.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize a new edition of the collection of laws respecting the public lands, and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

MONDAY, January 6.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the acting Secretary for the Department of War, transmitting forty copies of the Army Register, prepared for each member of the Senate, conformably to a resolution of the 13th of December, 1815.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to increase the salaries of the register and receiver of public moneys of the land office at Marietta; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, presented the petition of James Garey, who was a lieutenant in the 27th regiment of infantry during the late war with Great Britain, praying a donation of land or some other provision, for reasons stated in the petition.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CAMPBELL gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the third instant, for instructing the Committee of Finance to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act increasing the compensation allowed to the Sergeant at-Arms and Doorkeepers of Congress, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 3d instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of regimental and battalion paymasters, and agreed thereto.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of William Patterson and others, of Baltimore, owners of vessels, which were taken by order of the commanding officer of the United States, in that district, and sunk at the mouth of the harbor, opposite to Fort McHenry, which effectively obstructed the passage of the British fleet, in their meditated attack upon the port of Baltimore, and praying remuneration for losses and damages sustained by them in consequence thereof, as stated in the memorial.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Thomas Riddle. Whereupon

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee, on the petition of Robert Kidd; and, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

The bill to authorize a new edition of the collection of laws respecting the public lands was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

On motion by Mr. HARDIN, the appointment of an Assistant Doorkeeper was further postponed until the first Monday in February next.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, was read a third time, and passed.

HOME DEPARTMENT, &c.

Mr. SANFORD, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to an addition Executive Department, and to the office of Attorney General, reported a bill to establish a new Executive Department, and for other purposes; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill to establish a new Executive Department, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That there shall be an Executive Department, to be denominated the Home Department, and there shall be a principal officer therein, to be called the Secretary of the Home Department, who shall execute and perform such orders and duties as shall be given or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, in conformity to the Constitution and laws, relative to correspondence and communication with the Governors of the several States, relative to correspondence and communication with the Territories of the United States, and the territorial offices and governments, relative to the Indian nations, and to trade, intercourse, and treaties with them, relative to the General Post Office, relative to the District of Columbia, and the public concerns thereof, and relative to the Patent Office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, in the said Department, an inferior officer, who shall be called the chief clerk; he shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Department, shall be employed therein, as the Secretary may direct; and whenever the office of Secretary may be vacant, the chief clerk shall, during the vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers, appertaining to the Department.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That instead of a chief clerk in the Department of State there shall be an under Secretary of that Department, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of State, shall be employed as the Secretary of State may direct, and whenever the office of Secretary of State may be vacant, the under Secretary shall have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers, appertaining to that Department; and the under Secretary shall receive the same compensation as is now allowed to the chief clerk.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Mint of the United States shall be under the superintendence and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the survey of the coasts of the United States, shall be made under the superintendence and direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. SANFORD, from the same committee, reported a bill concerning the Attorney General of the United States, and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. The bill is as follows:

A Bill concerning the Attorney General of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That a suitable apartment, in some of the public edifices at Washington, shall be assigned to the Attorney General of the United States; that until such an apartment can be provided, the rent of the place, occupied by the Attorney General for his office, shall be paid by the United States; and that the necessary expense of fuel and stationery, used in the office of the Attorney General, shall be paid by the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Attorney General shall be authorized to employ one clerk in his office, whose annual compensation shall not exceed — dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court shall be authorized to allow, as a part of the contingent expenses of holding that court, the necessary expense of printed statements, on the part of the United States, in causes before that court in which the United States are parties; which sums, when allowed by the Supreme Court, shall be paid by the United States.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. SANFORD, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint report from the Secretaries of the different Departments respecting the annual settlement of the public accounts, reported a bill to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. The bill is as follows:

A Bill to provide for the prompt settlement of Public Accounts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the offices of Accountant and Additional Accountant of the Department of War, the office of Accountant of the Navy, and the office of Superintendent General of Military Supplies, be, and they are hereby, abolished.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all claims and demands whatever, by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever, in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or as creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the Treasury Department.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the officers in the Treasury Department, already established by law, there shall be the following officers, namely, four auditors, one comptroller, and a solicitor of the Treasury.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the first auditor to examine and settle all accounts accruing in the Treasury Department; it shall be the duty of the second auditor to examine and settle all accounts relative to the pay and clothing of the Army, the subsistence of the officers, bounties, and premiums, and the contingent expenses of the War Department; it shall be the duty of the third auditor to examine and settle all accounts relative to the subsistence of the Army, the Quartermaster's department, the Hospital department, and the Ordnance department; it shall be the duty of the fourth auditor to examine and settle all accounts accruing in the Navy Department, or relative thereto; and it shall be the duty of the fifth auditor to examine and settle all accounts accruing in, or relative to, the Department of State, and the Home Department.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the first comptroller to examine and revise all accounts settled by the first and fifth auditors; and it shall be the duty of the second comptroller to examine and revise all accounts settled by the second, third, and fourth auditors.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Solicitor of the Treasury to superintend the recovery of all debts to the United States, to direct suits and legal proceedings, and to take all such measures as may be authorized by the laws, to enforce prompt payment of all debts to the United States.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FROMENTIN, from the Joint Library Committee, made a report, which was read, as follows:

That, in pursuance of the duty devolving upon them to purchase books for the Library of Congress, they have bought, during the recess, the books, a catalogue of which, with the prices and the names of the persons from whom they were bought, is annexed.

By a reference to the accounts rendered by Joseph Nourse, Register of the Treasury, and acting as agent of the Joint Library Committee, which are annexed to, and the committee pray may be considered as part of, their report, it appears that since the last account rendered there was paid at different times by order of the Joint Library Committee a sum of $3,074 09; leaving in the hands of the agent of the Library Committee, subject to their order, an unexpended balance of $1,526 61. The committee have now under consideration several proposals, which, when finally acted upon, shall have employed the whole of the appropriation made in 1812.

The committee further report that they have given directions for the following periodical (both literary and political) publications to be regularly sent to the Library, as soon as published, to wit:

The Edinburg and Quarterly Reviews, republished in New York;

The British Review, the Annual Register, the Analytical Review, and Cobbett's Political Register, published in Great Britain;

The North American Review, published in Boston; The Portfolio, the Analectic Magazine, and Walsh's American Register, published in Philadelphia;

The Portico and the Weekly Register, published in Baltimore;

The National Register, the Daily National Intelligencer, and the Historical Register, published in Washington.

All the above periodical works now are or will soon be completed, from the beginning of publication to the present day.

Of not exactly the same character, but yet liable to the same annual expense, are the following works, (if it be deemed advisable to complete the publications of this description, which are now deposited in the Library,) to wit:

The Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, the Transactions of the Royal Society of London, the Transactions of the Irish Academy, Bath Society's papers, Transactions of the Society of Arts, Mémoires de l'Académie des Sciences, Mémoires de l'Institut de France, Delaplain's Repository, Cobbett's State Trials, and Public Characters.

General catalogues, published every year in Great Britain, in Leipsic, and in Paris; to which may be added works of merit, to be subscribed for occasionally, and which will require a disposable fund to be used on the emergencies created by the publication of such works, either in this country or in Europe.

In order the better to promote the views of Congress in establishing a Congressional Library, and the more securely to provide for, as far as attainable, a proportionately equal application of the Library fund to the several branches of human knowledge, and thereby stamp the Congressional Library with that degree of usefulness contemplated in its establishment, the committee invite the chairmen of the several committees of both Houses to furnish the Library Committee with a list of such books or indexes as may be deemed by them more particularly to refer to the business devolving upon each respective committee.

The committee have, moreover, directed to be placed in the Library a box, where any may be deposited, by the members of both Houses, the titles of such books as they may be desirous to procure.

The collection of law books now in the Library is as valuable and as complete as it is possible to have expected it to be, considering the time at which the books were purchased; but the many late publications which have appeared since, both in this country and in Europe, and the indispensable necessity of laying open all possible sources of the most extensive information on that head, have induced your committee to propose to Congress to appropriate a sum of $3,000 for the completion of that particular department of the Library of Congress.

The law appropriating $1,000 per annum for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress has expired. The committee beg leave to report a bill making a further appropriation of $1,500 per annum for five years.

In revising the laws passed by Congress concerning the Library, the committee observed that no provision had ever been made to extend to the Heads of Departments the privilege of using the books in the Congress Library, on the same terms on which members of Congress are permitted to use them. In the bill making a further appropriation for the purchase of books, the committee have inserted a section to remedy that omission.

Mr. FROMENTIN then reported a bill, making a further appropriation for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, and for other purposes; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

TUESDAY, January 7.

Mr. HORSEY presented the memorial of Edward Gilpin, and others, on the subject of regulating the weights and measures of the United States, representing the importance thereof; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to weights and measures, to consider and report thereon.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the sums respectively paid to each clerk in the several offices of that Department, for services rendered during the year 1816, made in obedience to the provisions of the act of April 21, 1806, to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks; and the report was read.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I communicate, for the information of Congress, the report of the Director of the Mint, of the operation of that establishment during the last year.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 6, 1817.

The Message and report were read.

Mr. SANFORD presented the memorial and representation of the commissioners of the State of New York on the subject of canals; and praying the aid of Congress in the construction of canals and locks, between the navigable waters of Hudson river and Lake Erie, and the said navigable waters and Lake Champlain, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to roads and canals, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HANCOCK submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the attorneys employed in the collection of moneys due to the United States, to give bond and security for the faithful accounting for all demands placed in their hands for collection; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TAIT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy lay before the Senate any information in the possession of the Department, respecting any surveys and examinations which may have been had in the Chesapeake bay, in reference to the situation of a site for a naval depot.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, the amount of money paid by the Government of the United States for the services of militia during the late war, stating the amount to each respective State, and distinguishing, as far as possible, what has been paid for militia called into service by authority of the Executive of the United States, and that paid for such calls made by authority of a State, and in what cases States have been reimbursed which have made advances for their militia; specifying the State in each case, as before.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of the Navy, on the expenditure and application of moneys drawn from the Treasury, from the first of October, 1815, to the 30th of September, 1816, inclusive, and of the unexpended balances of former appropriations remaining in the Treasury on the 1st of October, 1815; and the report was read.

The bill to establish a new Executive Department, and for other purposes, was read the second time; and, on motion of Mr. SANFORD, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Friday next.

The bill to increase the salaries of the register and receiver of public moneys of the land office at Marietta, was read the second time; and the further consideration thereof postponed until to-morrow.

The bill making a further appropriation for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, and for other purposes, was read the second time; and the further consideration thereof postponed until to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. TAIT,

Resolved, That the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, praying the admission of the said Territory, as a State, into the Union, be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

MESSRS. TAIT, BROWN, CHACE, MASON, of New Hampshire, and STOKES, were appointed the committee.

The bill to authorize a new edition of the collection of laws respecting the public lands, was read a third time, and the blank filled with "$1,500."

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act to authorize a new edition of the collection of laws respecting the public lands."

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill respecting the heirs and legatees of Thomas Turner; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Amasa Porter, and others, grocers in the city of New Haven, and its vicinity, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

UNITED STATES' BRANCH BANK.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill, requiring the Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish an office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill requiring the Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish an office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States be, and they are hereby, required to establish a competent office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia, pursuant to the provisions of the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States, passed the 10th day of April, 1816.

Accompanying this bill, Mr. CAMPBELL handed in the following document:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 28, 1816.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 26th instant, requesting me to furnish information as to the expediency of requiring the Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish, in the City of Washington, a competent office of discount and deposit, with my opinion of the facilities which would result from that measure in the management of the national finances, and the advantages which might accrue from it to the public interest, I have the honor to state, that, in the present disordered state of the currency, the establishment of a branch bank in the city could not fail to be highly useful in the management of the national finances. During the existence of the former Bank of the United States, when the evils of a fluctuating and depreciated currency did not exist, it was deemed expedient that a branch bank should be established in this city, for the convenience of the Treasury, notwithstanding there were several incorporated banks within the District. From the best information which I have been able to collect, there is good reason to believe, that the effect of a branch bank in the District of Columbia will be highly beneficial to the public, and advantageous to the Bank of the United States. As an evidence in favor of this opinion it is proper to state, that the banks of Alexandria and Washington, both chartered and unchartered, have applied to the Treasury Department, to use its influence with the Bank of the United States, to have a branch bank established within the District. In a national point of view, it would seem to be proper that the Seat of the Federal Government should have the immediate benefit of an institution, which has been created with an express view of aiding the exertions of the Government to restore the circulating currency to the specie standard, and, in fact, of giving a currency to the nation, which shall everywhere be of equal value with gold and silver. The power reserved by the Government of compelling the establishment of a competent office of discount and deposit within the District, it is presumed, was the result of a general conviction of the propriety, if not the necessity, of that measure.

I have, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD

Hon. C. W. CAMPBELL, Chairman.

WEDNESDAY, January 8.

Mr. MORROW presented the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, representing that many persons have settled upon the lands lately ceded by the different nations of Indians to the United States, and praying that they may be permitted to continue until those lands shall be offered for sale, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

charge of Nathaniel Taft from imprisonment," was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts; and, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

THE PUBLIC OFFICES.

The bill to create a new Executive (Home) Department was taken up.

Mr. TAFT having called on the committee who reported this bill for some explanation of their views in favor of this measure—

Mr. SANFORD briefly gave the explanation requested; though, he said, the reasons having been stated pretty much at large in the document before the House and the public, he had not conceived it necessary to trouble the House with many remarks on it. He adverted to the growth of the country, the increase of population, and consequently of business in the various public offices. He reviewed the history of the present departments of the Government, and their progressive enlargement in some branches; the Navy Department, for instance, by the addition of the Board of Commissioners, whilst other departments had remained stationary. The business, he said, which, with three and a half millions of population, was necessary to be done in the public offices, bore no proportion to the mass which now called for their attention. The arguments on which he generally sustained the bill, in the course of his remarks, were, the great expansion of our public business, the increase of business in the foreign department as well as at home, and the multitude and complication of details of public transactions, which required a distribution of them among the public offices, different from that which now exists.

Mr. KING commenced the expression of his views of this bill, by stating the fact, that in the original organization of the Government, it had been made a question whether a Home Department was necessary; and that, after the most mature consideration, it had been decided to be inexpedient: and the Department of State, as its name indicated, was to take charge of all matters of a civil nature, interior as well as foreign. It was true, Mr. K. said, that this was long ago, and that, as his colleague had said, there had been since a considerable increase in the business and population of the country. But was it certain, he asked, that a numerical increase carried with it anything like a necessity for multiplying departments for managing the public affairs? He could not, himself, see the force of that argument. Was it certain, because something was omitted or left undone in the departments now, that nothing would be omitted should the departments be increased? Whether we resort to experience at home, or wisdom from abroad, it is not proved, Mr. K. said, that by a multiplication of offices the business of a nation is better done. It was not certain that services would be better performed by the creation of a head of a department, which services not he, but others to be placed under him, are to perform. Supposing any department, the Treasury, for instance, to have full occupation, would the creation of two heads to it expedite the public business, or afford any security that it would be better done? He conceived the reverse. No more security would be afforded by creating two Departments of State in the room of one, which he believed was sufficient to despatch all the business now confided to it; most of which, being matter of detail only, required little more than the signature of the Secretary of State. Mr. K. adverted to the branches of business proposed to be assigned to the new department, and remarked on each. As to the correspondence with the Governors of States, he said, that any man, present at the formation of this Government, would have considered it a very extraordinary idea that a bill even should be introduced into Congress, much less that a law should be passed, to devolve on a subordinate head of a department, the tenure of whose office was at the will of the President, the charge of correspondence with the Governors of the several States. When General WASHINGTON was President, the Governors corresponded directly with him, and why? Because they hold an important portion of the sovereign power. For various reasons he assigned, Mr. K. was opposed to creating a new department to transact this business. As to the correspondence with the territorial officers, he said, that was no very distressing labor, being little more than a matter of form, attended to, except the mere signature of the Secretary, by the clerks in the office. As to treaties with the Indian tribes, he thought it well to leave that concern where it was; and, as to the trade with them, he hardly knew what it was; he should object, however, to appropriating any more money for Indian trade. Relative to the concerns of the District of Columbia, he did not conceive a department necessary for their management, and still less for the management of the Patent Office, to which, as at present, a single clerk was fully competent. On the whole, he could not see the necessity for creating a new department, the head of which would have a place in the Cabinet, and be one of the President's counsellors. Wishing further time to be afforded for the consideration of this important bill, he proposed its postponement for a few days.

On the suggestion of Mr. TAFT, and on motion of Mr. KING, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Wednesday next.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill respecting the office of Attorney General.

A motion was made by Mr. DAGGETT to strike out the 3d section of the bill, (authorizing the payment of the expenses of the printed statements of cases in which the United States were concerned before the Supreme Court.) but after some conversation, in the course of which Mr. MACON said that this was the only section in the bill which he thought ought to be retained, Mr. D. withdrew his motion.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out the first and second sections of the bill—the first allowing the Attorney General an apartment in the public buildings, (or office rent in lieu thereof,) and expenses of fire, &c.; the second allowing him a clerk.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, supported the motion by a few remarks; in the course of which he condemned both these provisions as unnecessary, and as going indirectly to increase the salary of the Attorney General.

Mr. BARBOUR required a division of the question, so as to take it separately on each section. He was in favor of the first section, but opposed to the second, because, he said, he was yet to learn the necessity of a clerk to the Attorney General. In favor of the first section, he said, generally, that the President had advised it, considering it important to the convenience of the Government, as Mr. B. did, that the law officer of the United States, to whom recurrence was had in all cases of difficulty, should not be without any sort of apartment for his accommodation. That officer's being constrained to resort to his own means for office room, was an exception to the principle which prevailed in regard to every other important officer of the United States. As regarded the convenience of citizens, also, Mr. B. conceived it important that this officer should be placed near the other departments, to whom, also, such vicinity would be very useful. As a matter of justice, also, he favored this measure, since the salary of the Attorney General bore no proportion to that of other officers of the Government, and he ought not to be called upon to pay the expenses of his office out of his moderate compensation. Mr. B. did not give much weight to the argument that the Attorney General of the United States could pursue his private practice, and at the same time discharge with fidelity his public duties, which required his constant residence at the Seat of Government, &c. So far from considering his compensation too great, he would, if it should appear necessary, increase the compensation of this officer, which was small relatively to the salaries of other officers of the Government.

Messrs. MACON and MASON, of New Hampshire, spoke, the latter more at large, in favor of expunging the two first sections of the bill; and Messrs. DAGGETT, SANFORD, and TROUP, against it.

The arguments in favor of striking them out were, generally, these: that the office of Attorney General, with the proposed addition to it of an office and a clerk, becomes at once the department of law, never intended certainly when this office was established, and this change will be the sure foundation of a bill to increase the salary attached to the office; that the salary of the office had already grown up from $1,500 to $3,000; that, whatever was the practice, it could never have been intended that the Attorney General should be a member of the Cabinet, any more than the Comptroller of the Treasury and some other officers; that the Attorney General was now better paid, in proportion to his duties, than any other officer of the Government; since, from the first establishment of the Supreme Court, the Attorney Generals, one year with another, had not argued more than two cases each term of it for the United States; that it was contemplated always that the Attorney General should pursue his private practice; that he ought to do so, since constant practice was known to be essential to make a good lawyer; that the predecessor of the present Attorney General pursued to great advantage his private practice; that, in Great Britain, the Attorney General is generally the most extensive practitioner, although, by the terms of his office, at the same time a cabinet counsellor; that, therefore, no increase of compensation (as this proposition was deemed essentially to be) was necessary; and because, if the compensation of the Attorney General was increased, an augmentation of the salaries of all the other officers of Government would follow of course.

On the other hand, it was argued that the Attorney General was an officer of great importance, to whom was confided the management of the law concerns of the United States; who was continually (almost daily) appealed to for his legal advice by one department or other; and who was, besides, by the practice of the Government, a Cabinet counsellor; that he ought, therefore, to have the same accommodation as other officers of the Government, of an office and a clerk—of a clerk, because it was important to retain copies of opinions of letters, and of correspondence with district attorneys, which by former Attorney Generals had never been done, no paper of any description having been handed from any one of them to his successor; that the private practice of the law, with the present duties of the office, which occupied all the time of the incumbent, must be inconsiderable, indeed, if not incompatible; that it was unjust to ask from an officer, whose salary was perhaps inadequate to his support, that he should subtract therefrom the amount of his official expenses.

The question on striking out the first section (respecting office rent) was decided in the negative—ayes 11.

The question on striking out the second section (allowing a clerk) was carried by a vote of 16 to 12—majority 4.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, January 13.

The credentials of WILLIAM SMITH, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next, were read, and laid on file.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Acting Secretary for the Department of War, comprehending contracts made by that Department in the year 1816, and those made by the purchasing and ordnance departments for the same period, in compliance with "an act concerning public contracts," passed April 21st, 1808, and the report was read.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, in favor of general and uniform regulations of the estates and affairs of insolvents, and praying a law may pass on that subject, for reasons stated in the petition, which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the petition of Louis Charles le Blanc, a citizen of the State of Louisiana, praying a grant of land in said State, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VARNUM presented the petition of John Otis, late collector of the customs for the district of Barnstable, praying relief for expenses incurred by him in carrying into execution the embargo laws, as stated in the petition; which was read and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of John Merrill, attorney to the administrator of Flavil Sabin, deceased, late a regimental paymaster, praying relief in the settlement of his accounts, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SANFORD presented the memorial of J. B. Stewart, in behalf of the assignee and legal representative of Francis Cazeau, late of the city of Paris, deceased, praying compensation for services rendered the American cause during the Revolutionary war, and for sacrifices made by his attachment thereto, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Oliver Spellman from imprisonment," reported it without amendment.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of William Markward and others, messengers in the several Executive Departments of the Government, praying an increase of compensation, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of David Chambers, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and documents.

The report and resolution were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant for instructing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to certain persons who were mounted rangers, and agreed thereto.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to procure copies of the existing militia laws of the different States, as well as correct reports of the number and organization of their militia, to be laid before the Senate at their next session.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant, for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of purchasing copies of the late edition of the acts of Congress; and, having agreed thereto, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. MACON, and Mr. VARNUM, were appointed to the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the expediency of an exchange of territory with the Indian tribes; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BARBOUR asked and obtained leave to bring in the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ John Trumbull, of Connecticut, to compose and execute a painting commemorative of the Declaration of Independence; to be placed, when finished, in the Capitol of the United States.

The resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the petition of certain members of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying for the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State, without division, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory on the same subject, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The Senate occupied some time on the report of a select committee on the petition of Robert Kidd, praying a remission of penalties on certain British merchandise imported after the declaration of war, and by him purchased and bonded at the custom-house—the report recommending that the prayer of the petitioner be rejected.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, moved to reverse the recommendation of the committee, so as to declare that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted, and supported his view of the subject at considerable length.

The report of the committee was supported by Messrs. BROWN and ROBERTS, and finally concurred in.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of John Ricaud, from imprisonment," reported it with amendments; which were read.

The bill concerning the Attorney General of the United States, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the City of Washington, was taken up, and after being, on motion of Mr. DAGGETT, amended so as to direct the moneys arising from the said sales to be appropriated to the reimbursement of any moneys expended for the public buildings and public improvements in the City of Washington, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize a new edition of the laws respecting the public lands." They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the act 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed the 9th of April, 1816," also a bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the subsistence of the Army during the year 1817," in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill partially to reorganize the Departments, and providing for the prompt settlement of public accounts, was taken up, when Mr. MACON having offered an amendment in the distribution of the duties to auditors, &c., the amendment was ordered to be printed, and, with the bill, postponed till to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Indiana; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of William Edwards; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Haslet," together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and the amendment having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and on the question, "Shall the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, January 14.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary for the Department of the Navy, comprehending a statement of the contracts made by that Department during the year 1816, prepared in obedience to the act of the 3d of March, 1809, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" and the report was read.

Mr. HORSEY presented the memorial of John Fisher and others, citizens of the United States, praying the revision and amendment of "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," passed the 12th of February, 1793, for the purpose of more effectually suppressing a traffic in negroes and people of color from the Middle to the Southern States, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the slave trade, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TAIT presented the memorial of E. Cutbush and Samuel R. Marshall, on behalf of the surgeons and assistants of the Navy of the United States, praying the regulation of their rank and increase of pay and emoluments, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON, from the committee, reported correctly engrossed, the bill authorizing the sale of certain grounds, belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington; the bill for the relief of William Edwards; also, the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Haslet."

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed, by a resolution of the sixth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of the regimental and battalion paymasters, and giving them rank in the Army," made a report, which was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, who were instructed, by a resolution of the 3d instant, "to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the appointment of additional agents in such States or Territories where it may be found necessary for the more convenient payment of such persons as are now, or may hereafter be placed on the pension list," made a report; which was read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 13th instant, for instructing the Secretary of War to procure copies of the existing militia laws of the different States, as well as correct reports of the number and organization of their militia, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, an exchange of territory with any of the Indian tribes; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

On motion, by Mr. FROMENTIN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War be required to lay before the Senate any document or information in his office respecting the exchange of lands with any of the Indian tribes, now completed or contemplated, under the act of Congress, approved on the 25th day of March, 1804, entitled "An act to erect Louisiana into two Territories, and to provide for the temporary government thereof."

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Public Lands on the petition of David Chambers. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and documents.

The bill, entitled "An act to amend the act 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed the 9th of April, 1816," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of James Garey, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition and documents.

WEDNESDAY, January 15.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Acting Secretary for the Department of War, exhibiting the names of the clerks employed in the several offices attached to that Department, and the sums given to each for the year 1816; and the report was read.

Mr. CHACE presented the petition of Jedediah Smith, of Roxbury, in the county of Orange, and State of Vermont, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the appointment of additional agents in such States or Territories, where it may be found necessary, for the more convenient payment of such persons as now are, or may hereafter be placed, on the pension list.

Mr. LACOCK offered several considerations, from inconveniences suffered by pensioners in different parts of the United States, particularly the Western country, from the want of additional agents, &c., to show the necessity of increasing the number of those agents, and concluded, by moving that the report be reversed, so as to declare it expedient to increase the number of agents for paying pensions.

After some remarks from Messrs. SANFORD, MACON, and TROUP, to show that the inconveniences stated ought to be removed by other measures than an increase of the agents, and a few observations explanatory by Mr. ROBERTS, and in opposition to the measure by Mr. HARDIN—

The report was, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, postponed to Monday.

The bill entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the subsistence of the army, during the year 1817," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Finance, to consider and report thereon.

The resolution to authorize the President of the United States to employ John Trumbull to execute a painting commemorative of the Declaration of Independence, was read the second time; and, on motion by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, referred to a select committee, with instructions to confer with Colonel John Trumbull, for the purpose of selecting two additional scenes from the period of the Revolution to be the subjects of paintings, which, together with the Declaration of Independence, when completed, are to be deposited in the Capitol of the United States.

Messrs. BARBOUR, GOLDSBOROUGH, and KING, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of Daniel Pettibone, praying to be employed to erect the necessary apparatus for warming the Capitol, now undergoing repairs, upon his improved plan, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

The report of the Military Committee, to whom was referred an inquiry into the subject, declaring it inexpedient to increase the pay of, and give rank to battalion and regimental paymasters, was taken up.

Mr. LACOCK, the mover of the inquiry, opposed the report, and advocated, at some length, the justice of increasing the pay of regimental paymasters, whose duties and labor have been much increased by the late arrangements of the Quartermaster's department, whose duties have been, in a great measure, transferred to the paymasters; and who are also deprived of any rank in the army.

Mr. WILLIAMS defended the report, and submitted facts to show that the paymasters were much better paid now than formerly, and much better, indeed, than any other part of the army.

The report was then concurred in by a large majority.

The engrossed bill authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington, was read the third time; and, after being amended, on motion of Mr. DAGGERT, by unanimous consent, so as to appropriate the proceeds of the sales to defray expenses for public improvements hereafter incurred, the bill passed, and was sent to the other House.

The engrossed bill for the relief of William Edwards was read a third time, and passed.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of William Haslet," was read a third time as amended, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to explain the act 'to authorize certain officers and other persons to administer oaths,' approved May the 31, 1798;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The last mentioned bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles de Blanc, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the memorial of James Miller, collector and inspector of the customs of the port of Nova Iberia, and the district of Teche, praying compensation for having discharged the duties of surveyor, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a new Executive Department, and for other purposes; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts.

Mr. MACON having proposed a further amendment thereto, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, January 16.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Rachael Dohrman, widow of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased, praying additional remuneration for the services of her late husband during the Revolutionary war, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TICHENOR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before the Senate, without delay, a statement of the number of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, now composing the Military Establishment of the United States, to what posts they are stationed, and the actual number at each post respectively.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of John Haslet, of the city of Charleston, praying an act may be passed remitting the penalties by him innocently incurred on the importation of thirty-six puncheons of rum in the brig Margaret, Captain Halm, from Porto Rico, in July, 1812, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution to authorize the President of the United States to employ John Trumbull to compose and execute a painting commemorative of the Declaration of Independence, reported it with an amendment, which was read.

Mr. CHACE presented the petition of Jonas Cutting, late Lieutenant Colonel of the 25th regiment of infantry, and superintendent of the recruiting rendezvous of said regiment, at Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, praying the reimbursement of certain expenses incurred by him in the line of his duty, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Vincennes, by Emmerson's mill, Carlisle, and Monroe, to Fort Harrison; and that they have leave to report, by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Charles de Blanc. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

The bill, entitled "An act to explain the act to authorize certain officers and other persons to administer oaths," approved May the 3d, 1798;" was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a new Executive Department, and for other purposes; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts, together with the amendments proposed thereto; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Oliver Spellman from imprisonment;" and it was ordered to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of John Ricaud from imprisonment," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and the amendments having been agreed to, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and, on motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Malcolm," reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Humes, collector of the revenue for the 6th district of Pennsylvania, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

Mr. ASHMUN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the subsistence of the Army during the year 1817," reported it without amendment.

FRIDAY, January 17.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, containing statements in relation to that fund, made in obedience to the "act for the better government of the Navy of the United States," and the report was read.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of a number of citizens of the State of New Jersey, praying the establishment of a certain post route, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of the postmaster at Newark, in New Jersey.

Mr. TAIT, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. TAIT, from the same committee reported a bill to establish a separate territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of William Smith, senior, confined in prison at Charleston for a debt due the United States, and praying to be discharged therefrom, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH also presented the petition of John Kingsbury praying compensation for his services as a musician in the Army of the United States, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, presented the memorial of Thomas Ewell, representing that he has made, and is bound by contracts, with the Navy Department, respecting gunpowder, and that the Department will not in any manner comply with the conditions of said contracts, and praying the interference of Congress for relief; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, also presented the petition of the Levy Court of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying pecuniary aid in the erection of a court-house, jail, and public offices; and to authorize the said court to levy a tax in aid of erecting the same, and also to authorize the levy court to purchase the necessary ground for the accommodation of the same; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provisions are necessary to be made by law for securing to the widows or other heirs of soldiers, who died or were killed in the service of the United States, during the late war, the land bounty due to the soldiers respectively.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the expediency of establishing a certain post route, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, for instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of altering the law imposing a duty on carriages; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, for information relative to the Military Establishment, and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing an exchange of territory with any of the Indian tribes;" and on motion, by Mr. MORROW, the consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Finance, on the petition of James Humes, Collector of the Revenue for the 6th District of Pennsylvania; and on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 13, as follows:

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress an account of the contingent expenses of the Government for the year 1816.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 17, 1817.

The Message and account therein mentioned were read.

The bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Oliver Spellman, from imprisonment," was read a third time, and passed.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of John Ricaud from imprisonment," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed with amendments.

MONDAY, January 20.

The PRESIDENT communicated a memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying for the appointment of an additional Judge east of Pearl river; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT also communicated another memorial of the said Legislature, praying the adjustment of British claims to certain lands, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

He also communicated a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting the report of the commissioners for ascertaining and adjusting claims to land in the eastern district of the State of Louisiana; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Samuel Brown, praying compensation for services during the Revolutionary war, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

On motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the 15th instant, the petition of James Miller, were discharged from the further consideration thereof; and the said petition was referred to the Committee of Finance, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STOKES presented the memorial and representation of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, respecting the lands within the State of Tennessee, reserved by said State, by her cession act, for the relief of her officers and soldiers, and other claimants; and the memorial was read.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill respecting the heirs and legatees of Thomas Turner, deceased, with instructions, reported it without amendment.

He also reported a communication from the Secretary of the Navy Department, in relation thereto; which was read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 17th instant for instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of the postmaster at Newark, in New Jersey; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 17th instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs in relation to the land bounty due to the soldiers who died or were killed in the service of the United States during the late war; and agreed thereto.

Mr. MACON communicated the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, adopting the resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to regulate the mode of choosing the Representatives in Congress, and Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and instructing their Senators to endeavor to obtain said amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and the resolutions were read.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the exchange of territory with any of the Indian tribes, and the consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of appointing additional agents for the more convenient payment of persons placed on the pension list; and, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

The Senate resumed the motion of the 16th instant, for information relative to the Military Establishment, and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was read the second time.

The bill to establish a separate territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a new Executive Department, and for other purposes. The bill was defended and supported by Messrs. ROBERTS, BARBOUR, and SANFORD, and opposed by Messrs. TAIT, MACON, and KING; and, no amendment having been proposed thereto, it was reported to the House, and, on motion by Mr. SMITH, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to allot rooms to the committees of each House; in which resolution they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution last mentioned was read three times by unanimous consent, and concurred in; Messrs. HARDIN and MACON were appointed the committee on their part.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Navy Department, made in obedience to the resolutions of the Senate of the 21st of December, 1815, and the 8th of January, instant, containing all the information in the possession of that department, respecting surveys of the waters of the Chesapeake, the Middle Ground, and the several sites proper for the establishment of docks and a naval depot; and the report was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

On motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Elisha Tracy, were discharged from the further consideration thereof; and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition and documents.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts, together with the amendments proposed thereto, and the further consideration was postponed until Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Malcolm," and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next. And it was ordered that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of Henry Malcolm, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the subsistence of the Army during the year 1817;" and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

PRIVATEER GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Frederick Jenkins and Rensselaer Havens, in behalf of the owners, officers, and crew of the late private armed brig General Armstrong, made a report; which was read. The report is as follows:

The Naval Committee of the Senate, to whom has been referred the memorial of Frederick Jenkins and Rensselaer Havens, in behalf of the owners, officers, and crew of the late private armed brig General Armstrong, report:

The memorialists state that on the 26th of September, in the year 1814, while the private armed brig General Armstrong was lying at anchor in the port of Fayal, she was attacked by a superior British force, and, after a brave resistance by her commander, Samuel C. Reed, and his valiant crew, the brig was destroyed. They also state that the vessel and armament cost $42,000, and pray that such relief, indemnity, or compensation may be extended to the owners, officers, and crew of the privateer, as, under the peculiar circumstances attending her destruction, may be deemed by Congress just and equitable.

The committee are left to conjecture the grounds on which the memorialists rely for a remuneration or indemnity from their own Government. It is presumed, however, that the claim must be supported, if supported at all, on one of two grounds: 1st. Because the vessel and armament were destroyed by the public enemy in a neutral port, in violation of the laws of nations; or, 2dly. Because the brave and gallant defence of Captain Reed, his officers, and crew, entitles them to the bounty of the Government.

The committee are unable to perceive what right of indemnity the citizens of the United States can acquire against their own Government for losses sustained in consequence of the violated rights of a third party. It is the duty, no doubt, of all Governments to extend to the person and property of the citizen all the protection in their power. It is the end of all Governments to do so. It is the right of the citizen to make known his wrongs to his Government, and it is the duty of the Government to seek redress by such means as it may deem expedient. The neutrality of Portugal was grossly violated in the case of the private armed ship General Armstrong. It was the duty of that Government to preserve her neutral character, and to protect the brig and all on board from any hostile attack while in her port. Either from want of ability or inclination, she failed to do so. But can this failure to support its own rights and perform its duty towards us, vest a right in an individual to come on his own Government for indemnity on account of a pecuniary loss? The United States, it is believed, have done, or will do, what comports with their rights and their character. That indemnity from Portugal for the loss of this property should be insisted on as an affair of State, is perhaps highly proper; but the committee cannot perceive how the weakness or the delinquency of Portugal can impose on the United States the duty of indemnifying the memorialists for the loss of the brig and her armament.

The committee believe that this opinion is in conformity with the practice of this Government, and perhaps of all Governments. Antecedent to the year 1802, much property belonging to citizens of the United States had been wrongfully seized by the cruisers of France. In no case known to the committee did this Government indemnify its citizens from its own Treasury. Indemnity was sought from France by negotiation, and obtained in the Louisiana convention. Citizens of the United States at this moment have claims to a vast amount against the Governments of France, Spain, and Naples, for property seized in violation of all right. On principle, all these claimants have the same right to demand indemnity from their own Government as the memorialists in the present case; for, in principle, the committee can see no distinction between a private armed ship and a merchant ship; nor between property captured and converted to the use of the captors, and property destroyed by a third party omitting to do its duty.

If this is a mere appeal to the liberality of Congress;

if the memorialists rely for the success of their application on the bravery, gallantry, and good conduct of Captain Reed, his officers, and crew, in the defence of the vessel, then the committee are sensible that a stronger case of the kind could not present itself. The stubborn bravery, the cool intrepidity, and presence of mind displayed by Captain Reed and his associates in the defence of the ship, were perhaps never equalled, certainly never surpassed, by any private armed vessel in the annals of naval warfare. It has excited the admiration of the nation, and cannot fail to immortalize those concerned. If actions like this are to be rewarded with money, too much could not be given. But Government is but the trustee of the nation, and is bound deliberately to examine into the principle on which the treasure of the nation is bestowed, and the extent of the precedent which is set in bestowing it. It is unknown to the committee that Congress, as yet, has ever dispensed its bounty, or in any way bestowed a gratuity for any achievement, except to its own peculiar force, nor in any case except there was victory. The committee are of opinion that it would be inexpedient to do so. It would open the Treasury to a class of cases arising out of the last war which would be extensive and onerous. The effects of such a measure must be counted on, for they would be felt in all future wars.

The case of the Essex, attacked also in a neutral situation, was a strong one. The defence there, too, was valiant, persevering, and highly honorable to all on board, as well as to the nation; yet Congress has done nothing, for the essential quality of victory was wanting to the transaction. The committee, therefore, in whatever aspect they view the application of the memorialists, are of opinion that it would be unsafe and inexpedient to grant it, and recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Frederick Jenkins and Rensselaer Havens.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution to authorize the President of the United States to employ John Trumbull to compose and execute a painting commemorative of the Declaration of Independence, together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee. On this bill there was a debate, Mr. BARBOUR being its principal supporter. The resolve was so amended as to authorize the execution of four pictures of the principal events of the Revolutionary history; and, thus amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

TUESDAY, January 21.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin, deceased; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the payment to the State of Georgia of certain claims for the services of the militia, called out under the authority of the United States, during the years 1792 and 1793, for the defence of the said State against Indian invasion, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draught and report a bill appropriating $109,130 65, for the payment of the said claim to the State of Georgia.

The report and resolution were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, for information relative to the Military Establishment, which, having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary at War be directed to lay before the Senate a statement at what posts the present Army of the United States are stationed, and the actual number at each post respectively.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed "to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, an exchange of territory with any of the Indian tribes."

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Campbell, Condit, Hardin, Howell, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Troup, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, King, Mason of Virginia, Thompson, Tichenor, Varnum, Wells, and Wilson.

So it was

Resolved, That an appropriation be made, by law, to enable the President of the United States to negotiate treaties with the Indian tribes; which treaties shall have for their object an exchange of territory owned by any tribe residing east of the Mississippi, for land west of that river.

On motion by Mr. MORROW,

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee of Finance, with instructions to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 9th of April, 1816, reported it with amendments, which were read.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of the ship owners, and others, interested in foreign commerce in the city of New York, representing that the operation of the several commercial and colonial regulations adopted by foreign nations for the protection and promotion of their own trade has depressed that of the United States, and praying that all restrictions be removed or rendered equal by the adoption of correspondent regulations on the part of the United States; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The resolution to authorize the President of the United States to employ John Trumbull to compose and execute certain paintings, was read a third time; and on the question, "Shall this resolution pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hardin, Horsey, Hunter, King, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thompson, Tichenor, Varnum, Wells, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, and Wilson.

So it was

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ John Trumbull, of Connecticut, to compose and execute four paintings commemorative of the most important events of the American Revolution; to be placed, when finished, in the Capitol of the United States.

The bill entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the subsistence of the Army, during the year 1817," was read a third time, and passed.

WEDNESDAY, January 22.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the memorial of Frederick Jenkins and Rensselaer Havens; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the payment to the State of Georgia of certain claims for the services of the militia, called out under the authority of the United States, during the years 1792 and 1793, for the defence of the said State against Indian invasion.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next; and that the report of the Secretary for the Department of War, of the 3d of February, 1803, in relation thereto, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CHACE presented the petition of Reuben Attwater, late Secretary of the Michigan Territory, praying compensation for the destruction of his property by the British, at the surrender of Detroit by General Hull, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain locations of lands therein described, together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CAMPBELL having proposed a further amendment:

On motion, by Mr. STOKES,

Ordered, That the bill, with the amendments proposed thereto, together with the memorial and representation of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, respecting the lands reserved by said State, by her cession act, for the relief of her officers and soldiers, and other claimants within the territory of the State of Tennessee, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, further to consider and report thereon.

The bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin, deceased, was read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Joseph Stewart and others,'" in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR,

Resolved, That five hundred copies be printed of the report of Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, dated December 16, 1793, on the privileges and restrictions of the commerce of the United States in foreign countries, pursuant to the resolution of the House of Representatives of February 23, 1791.

On motion by Mr. MASON, of Virginia,

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Ewell, be discharged from the further consideration thereof; and that the memorialist have leave to withdraw his memorial.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Indiana; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the heirs and legatees of Thomas Turner, deceased; and, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the negative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and, on motion by Mr. TARR, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a separate territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory; and, on motion by Mr. TARR, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 23.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of ratified treaties between the United States and the following Indian tribes:

1. The Wea and Kickapoo;

2. The united tribes of Ottawas, Chippewas, and Potawatomes, residing on the Illinois and Melwabee rivers and their waters, and on the southwestern parts of Lake Michigan;

3. That portion of the Winnebago tribe or nation residing on the Ouisconsin river;

4. The Sacs of Rock river and the adjacent country;

5. Eight bands of the Siouxs, composing the three tribes called the Siouxs of the Leaf, the Siouxs of the Broad Leaf, and the Siouxs who shot in the pine tops;

6. The Chickasaw tribe of Indians;

7. The Cherokee tribe of Indians;

8. The Chactaw tribe of Indians.

Congress will take into consideration how far Legislative provisions may be necessary for carrying into effect stipulations contained in the said treaties.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 25, 1817.

The Message was read.

MASSACHUSETTS PEACE SOCIETY.

Mr. VARNUM presented the memorial of the members of the Peace Society of Massachusetts, representing their views of the methods "which may diminish the frequency or circumscribe the calamities of war," and "may express the most noble of all ambitions, that of promoting peace on earth, and good will to man," and soliciting the attention of Congress; and the memorial was read. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the members of the Peace Society of Massachusetts, respectfully represents:

That the society which now solicits the attention of our national rulers, was instituted for the single purpose of diffusing pacific and benevolent sentiments through this country, and through the world. Impressed with a deep and sorrowful conviction that the spirit of Christianity, which is a spirit of mercy, peace, and kind affection, is imperfectly understood; afflicted by the accumulated miseries and extensive desolations which war has lately spread over the fairest, most fruitful, and most enlightened regions of the earth; and at the same time encouraged by many decisive proofs of the revival of purer and more benevolent principles among Christian nations, your memorialists have formed this association with the solemn and deliberate purpose of co-operating with the philanthropists of every country, in promoting the cause of peace and charity; in stripping war of its false glory, and in uniting different communities in the bonds of amity and mutual good will. We are sensible that, from the nature of our object, it is chiefly to be accomplished by a silent and gradual influence on the minds of men, and accordingly we have limited our operations to the circulation of useful treatises, in which the pacific spirit of our religion has been exhibited with clearness, and we hope with success. We believe, however, that the present moment demands a departure from our usual course, and we cherish the hope, that by an application to the Government under which we live, important service may be rendered to the cause of humanity, in which we are engaged.

The present memorial is founded on two occurrences, which we hail as auspicious to the pacification of the world. The first occurrence to which we refer is, the well known and unprecedented union of several of the most illustrious Powers of Europe, in declaring before "the Universe their unwavering determination to adopt, for the only rule of their conduct both in the Administration of their respective States, and in their political relations with every other Government, the precepts of christianity, the precepts of justice, of charity, and of peace.

The second occurrence to which we refer, is the decided expression of pacific sentiments and anticipations in the conclusion of the late Message of the President of the United States, in which his parting wishes for his country are expressed with tenderness and power. In this remarkable passage, worthy of the Chief Magistrate of a Christian community, he expresses his conviction that "the destined career of his country will exhibit a Government, which, whilst it refines its domestic code from every ingredient not congenial with the precepts of an enlightened age, and the sentiments of a virtuous people, seeks by appeals to reason, and by its liberal examples, to infuse into the law which governs the civilized world, a spirit which may diminish the frequency, or circumscribe the calamities of war, and meliorate the social and beneficent relations of peace; a Government, in a word, whose conduct, within and without, may bespeak the most noble of all ambitions, that of promoting peace on earth, and good will to man."

First—We respectfully solicit, if it be consistent with the principles of the Constitution, that the solemn profession of pacific principles, lately made by several distinguished sovereigns of Europe, may be met by corresponding professions on the part of our own Government. Whilst we are sensible that a melancholy discordance has often existed between the language and the conduct of rulers, we still believe that the solemn assertion of great and important principles, by men of distinguished rank and influence, has a beneficial operation on society, by giving to these principles an increased authority over the consciences of those by whom they are professed; by reviving and diffusing a reverence for them in the community, and by thus exalting the standard of public opinion, that invisible sovereign, to whose power the most absolute prince is often compelled to bow, and to which the measures of a free Government are entirely subjected. When we consider the support which is now derived to war, from the perversion of public sentiment, we are desirous that our Government should unite with the Governments of Europe in a distinct and religious acknowledgment of those principles of peace and charity, on which the prosperity of States, and the happiness of families and individuals, are alike suspended.

Secondly—We respectfully solicit that Congress will institute a deliberate inquiry, for the purpose of ascertaining the methods by which this Government may exert, on human affairs, that happy influence which is anticipated by the President of the United States; the methods by which it "may infuse into the law which governs the civilized world, a pacific spirit, may diminish the frequency, or circumscribe the calamities of war, and may express the most noble of all ambitions, that of promoting peace on earth, and good will to man." We are persuaded that a Government, sincerely disposed to sustain the august and sublime character which is here described, of the pacificator of the world, will not want means of promoting its end. We trust, that under the persevering and well directed efforts of such a Government, milder principles would be introduced into the conduct of national hostilities; that the reference of national controversies to an impartial umpire, would gradually be established as the law of the Christian world; and that national compacts would be formed for the express purpose of reducing the enormous and ruinous extent of military establishments, and of abolishing that outward splendor which has so long been thrown around war, and which has contributed so largely to corrupt the moral sentiments of mankind.

When we represent to ourselves a Christian Government sustaining this beneficent relation to the world; recommending peaceful methods of deciding the jarring claims of nations; laboring to strip war of its pernicious glare, and to diminish the number of those who are interested in its support; diffusing new and generous sentiments in regard to the mutual duties and obligations of different communities; and inculcating, by its own example, a frank and benevolent policy, and a sincere regard to the interests of the world; when we represent to ourselves such a Government, we want language to express our conceptions of the happy and magnificent results of its operations. It would form a new and illustrious era in human affairs, whilst, by the blessings which it would spread, and by the honor and confidence which it would enjoy, it would obtain a moral empire, more enviable than the widest dominion ever founded on violence and crime.

Loving our country with tenderness and zeal; accustomed to regard her as destined to an exalted rank, and to great purposes; and desirous to behold, in her institutions and policy, increasing claims to our reverence and affection, we are solicitous that she should enter first on the career of glory which has now been described, and that all her connexion with foreign States should be employed to diffuse the spirit of philanthropy, and to diminish the occasions and miseries of war. Of such a country, we shall exult to be the children, and we pledge to it an attachment, veneration, and support, which can only be accorded to a virtuous community.

It is our happiness that we live in an age when many noble schemes of benevolence have been accomplished; when the idea of a great amelioration of human affairs is no longer rejected as a dream of fancy; when statesmen are beginning to learn that all nations have a common interest; when philanthropy is extending its views to distant countries, and is executing purposes which would once have been regarded as the offspring of a blind and extravagant zeal. In this age of enlarged views, of generous excitement, of unparalleled activity for the good of mankind, it is hoped that the idea of a nation, espousing the cause of peace and humanity, will not be dismissed as visionary and impracticable. Enlightened and benevolent statesmen will discern that we do not live in ordinary times, but that a new and powerful impulse has been given to the human mind, which, under judicious influences, may issue in great and permanent improvements of the social state.

In presenting this memorial, we solemnly declare, in the presence of God, that we have no private or narrow views. On this subject we belong to no sect, no party. As lovers of our country, as friends of mankind, as disciples of Jesus Christ, with the spirit of peace in our breasts, and with a deep impression of the miseries of war, we are only solicitous to prevent the effusion of human blood by human hands, and to recall men to the conviction that they are brethren. We trust that the warmth with which we have spoken, will not be construed into a want of deference towards our rulers. On such a subject coldness would be a crime. Our convictions are deep, and no language but that of zeal and earnestness would do them justice.

We hope that we are addressing rulers who are sensible to the responsibility imposed by the possession of power; who regard the influence which is granted them on human affairs as a solemn trust; who consider themselves as belonging to their country and to mankind, and who desire to treasure up for themselves consolations in that hour when human applause will be an unavailing sound, and when no recollection will be so dear as that of having aided, with a disinterested zeal, the cause of peace and humanity.

By order of said Society:

WILLIAM PHILLIPS,
President.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, February 3.

Mr. SANFORD presented two memorials of sundry merchants of the city of New York, praying certain commercial regulations and restrictions, with such aid and protection as will guard the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the nation from becoming victims to that foreign policy and influence which will produce their destruction; and the memorials were read, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of the Pennsylvania Society for promoting the abolition of slavery, the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African race; and the petition was read, and referred to the committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the slave trade, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held to labor; and on motion by Mr. HOSSEY, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

The Government of Great Britain, induced by the posture of the relations with the United States which succeeded the conclusion of the recent commercial convention, issued an order on the 17th day of August, 1815, discontinuing the discriminating duties payable in British ports on American vessels and their cargoes. It was not until the 22d of December, following, that a corresponding discontinuance of discriminating duties on British vessels and their cargoes, in American ports, took effect, under the authority vested in the Executive by the act of March, 1816. During the period between those two dates there was, consequently, a failure of reciprocity or equality in the existing regulations of the two countries. I recommend to the consideration of Congress, the expediency of paying to the British Government the amount of duties remitted, during the period in question, to citizens of the United States; subject to a deduction of the amount of whatever discriminating duties may have commenced in British ports, after the signature of that convention, and been collected previous to the 17th of August, 1815.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 3, 1817.

The Message was read.

The following Message was also received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

The Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Most Christian Majesty, having renewed, under special instructions from his Government, the claim of the representative of Baron de Beaumarchais, for one million of livres, which were debited to him in the settlement of his accounts with the United States, I lay before Congress copies of the memoir on that subject, addressed by the said Envoy to the Secretary of State.

Considering that the sum of which the million of livres in question made a part, was a gratuitous grant from the French Government to the United States, and the declaration of that Government, that that part of the grant was put into the hands of M. de Beaumarchais as its agent, not as the agent of the United States, and was duly accounted for by him to the French Government; considering, also, the concurring opinions of two Attorneys General of the United States, that the said debit was not legally sustainable in behalf of the United States, I recommend the case to the favorable attention of the Legislature, whose authority alone can finally decide on it.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 31, 1817.

The Message and accompanying memoir were read.

TUESDAY, February 4.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of Simon Sarazin, and J. B. Aubert, praying compensation for the forcible occupation and destruction of four houses in the town of Baton Rouge, by the officer commanding the United States troops, in the year 1811; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TAIT, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory, reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States," reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. TICHENOR submitted the following motions for consideration :

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying so much of the second section of the act establishing the military staff, as relates to hospital surgeons and hospital surgeons' mates.

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a reformatory of the laws respecting the allowance and pay of private servants to the military and staff officers of the Army, in order to place them on a more economical establishment.

The bill for the relief of Jacint Laval was read a second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 3d instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new district for surveying public lands south of the State of Tennessee; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor, and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act for the relief of George T. Ross and Daniel T. Patterson, and the officers and men lately under their command," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read a third time, and amended by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act in addition to an act for the relief of George T. Ross and Daniel T. Patterson, and the officers and men lately under their command."

The bill authorizing the appointment of hospital surgeons and hospital surgeons' mates, in the Navy of the United States, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed; on motion, by Mr. DAGGERT, it was recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, further to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning the navigation of the United States;" in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. ROBERTS gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill authorizing a subscription for an additional volume of the laws of the United States, and for the distribution thereof.

The bill to repeal the second section of an act, entitled "An act concerning the pay of officers, seamen, and marines, in the Navy of the United States," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill making appropriations for the payment of certain claims for militia services to the State of Georgia, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to appoint additional pension agents; the bill to amend and explain an act giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States; and the bill for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased, were severally reported by the committee correctly engrossed.

WEDNESDAY, February 5.

The bill brought up yesterday for concurrence was read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee appointed to consider the subject, reported a bill to provide for the purchase and distribution of the laws of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions for instructing the Military Committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying so much of the second section of the act establishing the military staff as relates to hospital surgeons and surgeons' mates, and of a reform in the provisions of the laws respecting the allowance and pay of private servants to the military and staff officers of the army, in order to place them on a more economical establishment; and agreed thereto.

The bill to incorporate the members of the Columbian Institute was read the second time.

The engrossed bill to appoint additional pension agents was read a third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill to amend and explain an act giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States, was read a third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased, was read a third time, and the blanks were filled, first, with three hundred; second, with one hundred.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased."

The bill granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor, was read a third time, and passed.

Agreeably to special order the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters; and, on motion by Mr. SMITH, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill directing the discharge of Lewis Olmsted from imprisonment; and no amendment having been agreed to, the President reported the bill to the House, and it was engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making provision for subsisting the Army of the United States, by authorizing the appointment of commissaries of subsistence; and, on motion by Mr. HARDIN, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ROBERTS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing a subscription for an additional volume of the Laws of the United States, and for the distribution thereof; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

PETITION OF SARAH DEWEES.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Dewees, made a report, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Dewees; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. The report is as follows:

That they find it to be the object of the petitioner to obtain indemnity for buildings, the property of her late husband, destroyed by the public enemy while occupied, under the authority of the Quartermaster General of the United States, as a place of regular military deposit at the Valley Forge, in the year 1777.

The petitioner refers to a report of a select committee, made to the House of Representatives on the 11th of February, 1794, on the petition of her late husband, Colonel William Dewees. That report sets forth 'that the facts alleged in the said petition are satisfactorily established; that it appears the property was taken for public use, contrary to the wishes and remonstrances of the petitioner; that the chief part of his buildings were occupied as a deposite for military stores, where a part continued until the approach of the enemy; that, on the arrival of the enemy, he consumed the stores with the building; that the destruction of the said property is to be ascribed wholly to the circumstance of the military stores being there deposited, as none of the buildings in the vicinity suffered in like manner; and that the claim of the petitioner is not barred by any act of limitation, having been exhibited at the Treasury within the period limited by those acts.'

The above-cited report concludes with a resolution to bring in a bill for the relief of the petitioner. The Committee of the Whole appear to have reported the resolution negatived, which report was rejected by the House.

From that time until the death of Colonel Dewees, embarrassed circumstances, consequent on the loss of his property and great infirmity of body, prevented him from prosecuting his claim. In 1811, the petitioner petitioned Congress. Her vouchers were then on the files of the House of Representatives; but which now appear to have been destroyed in the conflagration of

SENATE.

Proceedings.

1814. Copies of these vouchers, which the committee have no doubt are genuine, together with evidence recently obtained of the most respectable character, accompany the petition.

The petitioner represents her case as coming entirely within the scope of an act passed at the last session of Congress, authorizing the payment for buildings destroyed by the enemy while occupied as a military deposite. The force of this suggestion the committee are compelled to admit in all its extent.

The committee believe the destruction of Colonel Dewees's buildings was clearly sanctioned by the usages of civilized warfare, and that the obligation on the Government to make compensation for the loss of property thus taken for public use is unequivocal. In the lapse of time for which indemnity has been withheld, the committee see nothing to weaken this obligation. The facts were established to the satisfaction of the House of Representatives as early as 1794. From a diligent examination of the records of the House of Representatives, the committee are induced confidently to believe no claim similar in character has ever been made on the justice of Congress since the establishment of the present Government.

They therefore respectfully recommend the payment of the claim of Sarah Dewees, and report a bill making the necessary appropriation.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed the ninth of April, 1816," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Claims, and Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair, and it was reported to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 6.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition in behalf of the representatives of Francis Cazeau, and having agreed thereto, on motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, it was re-committed to the said committee, to report a bill accordingly.

The bill for the relief of Sarah Dewees was read the second time.

The bill authorizing a subscription for an additional volume of the laws of the United States, and for the distribution thereof, was read the second time.

The bill to provide for the purchase and distribution of the laws of the United States, was read the second time.

The engrossed bill to provide for the punishment of crimes and offences, committed within the Indian boundaries, having been read a third time; on motion, by Mr. DAGGETT, it was re-committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, further to consider and report thereon.

The bill directing the discharge of Lewis Olmsted from imprisonment, was read a third time, and passed.

Agreeably to special order, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters.

Mr. SMITH having proposed sundry amendments thereto, on motion, by Mr. TALBOT, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next, and the amendments were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill entitled, "An act to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the ninth of April, 1816," as amended; and the bill having been further amended, and a further amendment being proposed by Mr. TALBOT, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 7.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

On comparing the 4th section of the act of Congress, passed March 31, 1814, providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, with the article of agreement and cession between the United States and State of Georgia, bearing date April 30, 1802, it appears that the engagement entered into with the claimants interferes with the rights and interests secured to that State. I recommend to Congress that provision be made, by law, for payments to the State of Georgia equal to the amount of Mississippi stock which shall be paid into the Treasury, until the stipulated sum of $1,350,000 shall be completed.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 6, 1817.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The following Message was also received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 28th of last month.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 7, 1817.

The Message and report therein mentioned were read.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the Board subsequent to their last report, of the 7th of February, 1816, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Board, dated the 6th day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted and prayed to be received as part of this report; and the report was read.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee of Claims, pursuant to instruction, reported a bill for the benefit of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant of Montreal; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, presented the memorial of the ship owners, and others interested in foreign commerce, in the town of Portsmouth, and State of New Hampshire, representing that, in consequence of the measures adopted by foreign nations for the promotion of their own navigation, the ship owners of the United States are deprived of an equal and fair participation in the carrying and West India trade; that although the amount of tonnage has greatly increased since the year 1806, yet the employment of it has declined in a degree highly alarming to all who, like themselves, depend on navigation for their support and prosperity; and praying the adoption of such regulations as may relieve the navigation of the United States from its present embarrassment; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of James Reed and others, praying the right of pre-emption to a certain tract of land, on which they have erected certain improvements, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RUGGLES offered instructions from the Legislature of the State of Ohio to their Senators, to use their influence to procure the passage of a law of Congress giving the inhabitants on the United States' reservation, at Lower Sandusky, the pre-emption right to such part or portion of said reservation as will secure to said inhabitants their improvements, upon such terms and conditions as may appear reasonable and just; and moved that they be received and read, which was determined in the negative. Whereupon,

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate deem it inexpedient that instructions from a State Legislature, to the Senators from such State, should be received and filed in the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. DAGGETT, the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the law entitled, "An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and delegates from Territories," were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. HARDIN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to the infant children of Captain James Logan, the Shawnee chief, who fell in the service of the United States, in the late war with Great Britain, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, passed the 9th of April, 1816," and the bill having been further amended,

On motion, by Mr. DAGGETT, to strike out the first section of the bill, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Hanson, Hardin, Horsey, Hunter, Mason of Virginia, Noble, Ruggles, Talbot, Tichenor, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Condit, Gaillard, Howell, Lacock, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Roberts, Sanford, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Varnum, and Wilson.

The bill having been further amended by adding thereto a new section, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning the Naval Establishment;" in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read twice, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making provision for subsisting the Army of the United States, by authorizing the appointment of commissaries of subsistence; and on motion, by Mr. WILLIAMS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill establishing the salaries of the messengers in the Executive Departments; and on motion, by Mr. VARNUM, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the fourth day of March next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Foreign Relations; and on motion, by Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Jacint Laval; and, no amendment having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the members of the Columbian Institute; and on motion, by Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Joseph E. Boyd, of Portland, in the District of Maine, praying to be allowed the sum of $1,374 35 in the settlement of his account, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

MONDAY, February 10.

The credentials of JOHN WILLIAMS, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Tennessee, to hold said appointment from the 4th day of March next, until the meeting of the next session of the General Assembly of that State, were presented; and the credentials were read, and laid on file.

Mr. ASHMUN presented the petition of Samuel Upton and Thomas Adams, praying to be discharged from the payment of certain bonds given for duties on the goods found in the stores at Castine, in the State of Massachusetts, upon the re-occupation of that place by the United States, under the Treaty of Peace, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the petition of Edward Shubrick and others, officers of the late United States brig Chippewa, stating that, in consequence of the loss of said brig, they had been deprived of their clothing and personal property, and praying remuneration therefor; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act concerning the navigation of the United States," reported it with amendments, which were read.

On motion, by Mr. MACON,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

Messrs. MACON and TARR were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TICHENOR presented the petition of James D. Pollett, of Burlington, in the State of Vermont, praying the remission of a fine incurred under the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HUNTER presented the memorial of Francis Henderson and family, heirs and representatives of John Laurens, deceased, a Lieutenant Colonel in the Army of the United States, and some time commissioned by Congress special Minister to the Court of France, praying the allowance of a certain claim exhibited in the memorial, with provision for the discharge thereof; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and other exotic plants thereon; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, also reported a bill to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph W. Page, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed the 9th of April, 1816," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill for the relief of Jacint Laval was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. TARR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill authorizing the appointment of hospital surgeons and hospital surgeons' mates in the Navy of the United States, reported it with an amendment, which was read.

Mr. CHACE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARDIN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post office at, and a post route through, the town of Bedford, in the county of Gallatin, and State of Kentucky, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petition of G. W. Johnson and others, praying compensation for certain lands, held under the original grantees from the French Court of Vincennes, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following motion for consideration:

SENATE.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for granting the right of pre-emption to the inhabitants settled on the reservation at Sandusky, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post routes, viz : from Corydon, by Shoemaker's, Troy, Mount Duval, Darlington, and Evansville, to Harmony; from Corydon, by Greenville and Fredericksburg, to Salem; and from Vincennes, by Princeton and Evansville, to Hendersonville, in the State of Kentucky, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHACE submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force, after the present session of Congress, the act passed on the third day of March, 1815, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law passed April 19, 1816, entitled "An act to abolish the existing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and to lay other duties in lieu of those at present imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," so far as to exempt the distillation of spirituous liquors exclusively made of fruit from the operation of the act aforesaid.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 7th instant, "that the Senate deem it inexpedient that instructions from a State Legislature to the Senators from such State should be received and filed in the Senate;" and, on motion by Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the fifth day of March next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 7th instant, for instructing the Committee on Pensions to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to the infant children of Captain James Logan, a Shawnee chief, and agreed thereto.

The bill for the benefit of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant of Montreal, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters, together with the amendments proposed thereto; and, on motion by Mr. SMITH, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Park Holland;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge as a permanent fund for internal improvement the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States share of its dividends;" in which ills they request the concurrence of the Senate. The two bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held to labor; and the bill having been amended, on motion by Mr. HARDIN, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making provision for subsisting the Army of the United States, by authorizing the appointment of commissioners of subsistence. And, after progress, on motion by Mr. TICHENOR, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate—

1st. The number of complete rations and parts of rations issued by the commissaries of the northwestern army from the 1st of September, 1812, to the 31st of May, 1813.

2d. The number of rations and parts of rations issued by the contractors for the same period.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant, for instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of exempting from duties the distillation of spirituous liquors exclusively made of fruit; and, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. MACON, from the joint committee appointed on the 10th instant to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, reported in part the following resolution, which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock; that one person be appointed a teller, on the part of the Senate, to make a list of votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the votes, and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Ordered, That Mr. MACON be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, agreeably to the foregoing resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, who were instructed, by a resolution of the Senate, to inquire into the expediency of so altering the law imposing a duty on carriages as to exempt from its operation any carriage which is usually and chiefly employed in husbandry, or for the transportation or carrying of goods, reported the following resolution: which was read:

Resolved, That it is not expedient, at present, to alter the law imposing a duty on carriages, so as to exempt from duty any carriage which is usually and chiefly employed in husbandry, or for transportation or carriage of goods.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, who were instructed, by a resolution of the Senate, to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act, entitled, "An act increasing the compensation allowed the Sergeant at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives, and of the Doorkeeper of the Senate and House of Representatives," approved March 13th, 1815, reported the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to repeal the act, entitled, "An act increasing the compensation allowed the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives, and of the Doorkeeper of the Senate and House of Representatives," approved 13th March, 1815.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted the 10th instant, by Mr. HARDIN, which was modified, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Port William, in the State of Kentucky, by Bedford to Newcastle, in the said State.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted the 10th instant, by Mr. LACOCK, for requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before the Senate certain information, in relation to certain commissaries and contractors, supplying the army; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of establishing a land office in the eastern part of the State of Indiana; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law, for granting the right of pre-emption to the inhabitants settled on the reservation at Sandusky, in the State of Ohio; and agreed thereto.

The bill making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes, was read the second time.

The bill entitled, "An act for the relief of Park Holland," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled, "An act to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvements, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States' share of its dividends," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, to consider and report thereon.

On motion by Mr. LACOCK, to reconsider the vote on passing to a third reading the bill entitled, "An act to amend the act, 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States,' passed the 9th day of April, 1816," as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 15, as follows:

clared JAMES MONROE elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the fourth day of March next; and DANIEL D. TOMPKINS Vice President of the United States, commencing with the fourth day of March next.

The votes of the Electors were then delivered to the Secretary of the Senate; the two Houses of Congress separated, and the Senate returned to their own Chamber.

FORTIFICATIONS, &c.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be examined and surveyed the eastern entrance into Long Island Sound, the harbor of Newport, and Hampton Roads, by commissioners; and that the said commissioners report their opinions as to the practicability of defending the said Sound, Harbor, and Roads, by fortifications; and if defensible, or any of them, what would be the probable expense thereof.

That he be requested, also, to cause to be examined the coasts and waters of the United States, north of the Delaware, with a view to the selection of a proper site for a naval depot, rendezvous, and dock yard; and, it is further requested, that the said reports, opinions, and estimates be laid before the Senate in the first week of the next session of Congress.

Mr. TAIT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act concerning the Naval Establishment,'" reported it without amendment.

THURSDAY, February 13.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of George Thomas and others, praying for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of D. W. Boudet, stating that he has been for some time past making arrangements for establishing a museum of natural and artificial curiosities, to which he intends to devote his time and labors, and praying that the establishment may be denominated, in law, a National Museum, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to a National University, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew J. Villard, made a report, together with the following resolution :

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, reported it with amendments, which were read.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Simon Sarazin and J. B. Aubert, of Baton Rouge, in the State of Louisiana, made a report, together with the following resolution :

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their papers.

Mr. CHACE presented the petition of James Green, late a captain in the United States Army, praying relief, in consideration of wounds received while in the service of his country, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 11th instant, for instructing the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, the town of Darien, in the State of Georgia, as a port of entry, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 11th instant, for instructing the Committee on Pensions to inquire into the propriety of placing James Gorham, of New Haven, in Connecticut, on the pension list; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted on the 12th instant, by Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs: which, having been amended, on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, was agreed to as follows :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be examined and surveyed the eastern entrance into Long Island Sound, the harbor of Newport, and Hampton Roads, and of York river, by commissioners; and that the said commissioners report their opinions as to the practicability of defending the said sound, harbor, river, and roads, by fortifications: and if defensible, or any of them, what would be the probable expense thereof.

That he be requested, also, to cause to be examined the coasts and waters of the United States north of the Delaware, with a view to the selection of a proper site for a naval depot, rendezvous, and dock yard; and, it is further requested, that the said reports, opinions, and estimates, be laid before the Senate in the first week of the next session of Congress.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act, entitled, "An act increasing the compensation allowed the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives, and of the Doorkeeper of the Senate and House of Representatives," approved March 13th, 1815, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of so altering the law imposing a duty on carriages, as to exempt from its operation any carriage which is usually and chiefly employed in husbandry, or for the transportation or carrying of goods; and agreed thereto.

SENATE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Brown. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled, "An act to amend the act 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed the 9th of April, 1816," as amended, and on motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion, which was read, and considered :

Resolved, That the Journal of the Proceedings of the Senate on yesterday, so far as they are connected with the service of counting the ballots for President and Vice President of the United States, be made up in conformity to the precedents heretofore established in similar cases.

And, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 16, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Daggett, Gaillard, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Roberts, Stokes, Talbot, Troup, Williams, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Chace, Condit, Dana, Fromentin, Lacock, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Tichnor, Varnum, and Wells.

NOTIFICATION OF ELECTION.

On motion by Mr. MACON,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be delivered to JAMES MONROE, Esquire, of Virginia, now Secretary of State of the United States, a notification of his election to the office of President of the United States; and to be transmitted to DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, Esquire, of New York, a notification of his election to the office of Vice President of the United States; and that the President of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following, viz :

"Be it known, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened at the City of Washington, on the second Wednesday in February, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, the underwritten, President of the Senate pro tempore, did, in presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President of the United States; whereupon it appeared that James Monroe, of Virginia, had a majority of the votes of the Electors as President, and Daniel D. Tompkins, of New York, had a majority of the votes of the Electors as Vice President. By all which it appears that James Monroe, of Virginia, has been duly elected President, and Daniel D. Tompkins, of New York, has been duly elected Vice President of the United States, agreeably to the Constitution.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, this — day of February, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen."

And that the President of the Senate, do cause the certificate aforesaid to be laid before the President of the United States, with this resolution.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters, together with the amendments proposed thereto; and Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair. And after progress, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 14.

Mr. FROMENTIN submitted the report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, and documents in relation to the Capitol and President's House; and the report and documents were read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of NICHOLAS VANDYKE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, for the term of four years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; which were read, and laid on file.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary of Treasury, containing a statement of lands sold in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and in the Territories of Illinois and Mississippi, from the 1st of October, 1815, to the 30th of September, 1816; showing, also, the amount of receipts from individuals, and payments made by receivers during the same time, with the balance due both on the 1st of October, 1815, and 1st of October, 1816; and the report was read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Postmaster General, containing a list of contracts made in the year 1816; which was read.

Mr. FROMENTIN submitted the following motion :

That the Journals be so amended as to include the statement of the proceedings relating to the election of President and Vice President of the United States, on Wednesday, the 12th instant, as read by the Secretary of the Senate, on Thursday, the 13th instant, prior to the motion made by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, to amend the Journal so as to make it conformable to former precedents on a similar occasion.

On motion by Mr. DAGGETT,

Resolved, That said motion be referred to a select committee, with instructions to revise and correct the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate, of the 12th instant, so far as respects the counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

Ordered, That Messrs. DANA, BARBOUR, and DAGGETT, be the committee.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of Wade Hampton, late a Major General in the Army of the United States, praying that provision may be made by law for his reimbursement and indem-nification in the result of a suit instituted against him by a certain James McConnel, for false imprisonment; having been arrested and tried by a general court martial, under suspicious circumstances, by order of the memorialist, while he commanded on the line between the United States and Canada; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Denis de la Rondi, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Park Holland," reported it without amendment.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BROWN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing vessels departing from the town of Bayou St. John John and basin of the Canal de Carondelet, for foreign ports, to clear out at the custom-house in the city of New Orleans; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Frederick Folley, praying indemnity for certain losses sustained by him, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew J. Villard. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Simon Sarazin and I. B. Aubert, of Baton Rouge, in the State of Louisiana; and in conformity thereto, the petitioners had leave to withdraw their papers.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes, passed the 9th of April, 1816," as amended; and the question recurring on the motion by Mr. LACOCK, to reconsider the vote on the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason of Virginia, Noble, Ruggles, Talbot, Tichenor, Wells, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Condit, Gaillard, Hanson, Lacock, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Roberts, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Varnum, and Wilson.

So it was agreed to reconsider the vote on the motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

Whereupon Mr. DAGGETT renewed the motion to strike out the first section of the bill; and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Hanson, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason of Virginia, Noble, Ruggles, Talbot, Tichenor, Wells, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Condit, Gaillard, Lacock, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Roberts, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Varnum, and Wilson.

On motion, by Mr. DAGGETT, the bill was referred to a select committee, with instructions to conform the bill to the amendment made by striking out the first section, so as to retain the amendments already made by the Senate, not inconsistent with the above instruction.

Messrs. DAGGETT, ROBERTS, and BARBOUR were appointed the committee.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. LACOCK, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to roads and canals, made a report in part; and the report was read; when Mr. L., from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act to set apart and pledge as a permanent fund for internal improvements the bonus of the United States Bank, and the United States share of its dividends," reported it without amendment.

The report is as follows:

That, on the general utility and national importance of roads and canals, little remains to be added to the stock of information now in possession of the Senate, and to be found in the several reports made on that subject. The committee, however, would observe, in addition, that the present period appears to them peculiarly propitious, and strongly invites to the commencement and prosecution of such a system of public improvement. To the pleasing prospect of peace abroad, we enjoy mutual confidence and tranquillity at home; our resources are abundant; our public revenues ample; our citizens at all times evincing a willingness to make every sacrifice for the public good, and on whom perfect reliance may be placed, more especially when the contributions required most, when obtained and judiciously applied, promote their own interest, and add, in an eminent degree, to the wealth, comfort, and safety of the nation; and it appears to your committee, that the experience dearly purchased in the late war should not be regarded with indifference. Much of the money expended in the necessary defence of the seaboard, as well as the lives of many valuable citizens, would have been saved to the nation, had a good inland water communication been made on our Atlantic frontier. The transportation of our armies, with all the munitions of war, to the most vulnerable points, would have been facilitated, and the advantages of the enemy, arising from the celerity of his movements by water, greatly diminished. Moreover, the products of the West and South, consumed in the East and North, could have been transported secure from the common hazards of a sea voyage, and in defiance of blockading squadrons; and thus the inhabitants of the United States, dispersed over a vast territory, embracing various climates, suitable to the production of all the necessities and many of the luxuries of life, might, even in a state of war, rely with comfort and security on their own internal resources.

Proceedings.

To these advantages, that refer themselves more especially to a state of war, must be added those, if possible, of a more imperative character, that will at all times arise to the nation from an improved state of her roads and inland navigation.

The people of these United States are spread over an extensive territory, and that dispersion of inhabitants is keeping full pace with the increase of population; and by the people thus dispersed, of different habits and pursuits, and in many instances with discordant views, is the national sovereignty exercised, and its fundamental powers directed; for, politically speaking, there is in the United States but one order or grade known—that of the people: and hence arises the imperious necessity in a Government thus constituted of tying together the whole community by the strongest ligatures. This your committee believe can be best effected by the construction of roads and canals; by these means, commercial and social intercourse will be made easy; industry in all its branches encouraged, by the increased rewards bestowed on every exertion; the love of country will be awakened, and a laudable spirit of national pride substituted in place of sectional jealousies; a community of interest and feeling will produce mutual confidence and affection; thus, being one people, the nation can have but one object in view—the continuance and preservation of a Government founded in equity and justice, administered for the advantage of all, and calculated, in the calm of peace, to call forth talents and industry for the acquisition of property, and in war the surest guarantee for its security and protection.

With these general observations on the national importance of internal improvements, your committee will endeavor to lay before the Senate a general outline of such public works, embracing the United States generally, and consulting, as far as practicable, the interest of each section of the Union, and which they conceive, in a further improved state of our national industry, may be completed without embarrassment to the operations of the Treasury, or imposing additional burdens on the people.

On the subject of national roads, the first that presents itself, and of primary importance, is a turnpike from Maine to Louisiana, passing through the Seat of the National Government and the principal cities and towns on this route; secondly, roads to connect the highest navigable points on the Atlantic rivers with such points on the corresponding streams that fall into the northern and western lakes, and the Mississippi river and its branches; and, lastly, such military or other roads as may serve to connect the scattered settlements in our States or Territories with the more compact population of the interior, and thereby secure the frontier settlements, in a great measure, from hostile annoyance, and enhance the value of the public lands, by inducing a more dense population.

The other branch of this system of public improvements, and equal, if not superior, in importance, is the construction of canals, and the improvement of the navigation of our rivers.

1. An inland or shore navigation, from the harbor of Boston to the river St. Mary's, in Georgia. To connect these points, it is ascertained that not more than one hundred miles will need the aid of canals; and, from an estimate made by Mr. Gallatin, when Secretary of the Treasury, will incur an expense little exceeding $3,000,000—less, it is believed, than $200 per mile, taking the whole distance of this water communication.

2. A canal from the Hudson or North river to Lake Erie, and from that lake to some of the many navigable waters of the Ohio river, which approach within a few miles of its margin, or intermix with its navigable waters.

3. The improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river, more particularly the Falls at Louisville.

4. The improvement of the several Atlantic rivers, and the corresponding streams that empty into the Mississippi and Ohio rivers.

MONDAY, February 17.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Postmaster General of the clerks employed in the General Post Office, and the amount of salaries paid them for the year 1816; and the report was read.

Mr. DAGGETT, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 9th day of April, 1816," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, in behalf and for the use of the United States, to purchase or cause to be erected suitable buildings for custom-houses and public warehouses in such principal district in each State where the said Secretary shall deem the same necessary, for the safe and convenient collection of the revenue of the United States.

—On motion, by Mr. HANSON,

"That the Committee of Finance, to whom were referred the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the Metropolis, the petition of the President and Directors of the Patriotic Bank of Washington, and the petition of the President and Directors and Company of the Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington, respectively, praying charters of incorporation, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that they be severally referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon;

It was determined in the negative.

Whereupon, Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, submitted the following motions for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Finance be instructed to report to the Senate a bill providing for the establishment of a bank within the City of Washington, with a capital equal to the sums which, by a certain time to be specified, shall be subscribed and actually paid. To be not less than one million, nor more than three millions of dollars. Two-thirds of which may be paid in the funded debt of the United States, and the other third in specie; and giving to the several banking associations now existing within the District of Columbia, the prior right of subscribing for so much of said capital as shall be equal to the joint stock of such associations respectively.

Resolved, further, That the said Committee report a bill prohibiting, after a certain time, to be therein named, under suitable penalties, the making and issuing, by any unauthorized association or individual within said District, notes or bills, with intent to cause the same to be circulated and received in payment, in like manner as the notes and bills of incorporated banks usually are circulated and received in payment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Denis de la Rondi; and, in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The bill authorizing vessels departing from the town of Bayou St. John and basin of the Canal de Carondelet, for foreign ports, to clear out at the custom-house in the city of New Orleans, was read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of Government for the year 1817;" also a bill, entitled "An act relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain ground belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill last mentioned, and concurred therein.

The two bills last brought up for consideration were read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held to labor, and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly: And the amendments having been concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters, together with the amendments proposed thereto. Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair.

On motion, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until the fifth day of March next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Condit, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Hardin, Macon, Mason of Virginia, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Troup, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Daggett, Goldsborough, Hanson, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Taylor, Thompson, Tichenor, Varnum, Wells, and Wilson.

The bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair, and it was reported to the House accordingly.

On the question to concur in the following amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, to wit:

Insert a new section as follows:

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any constable, or any public officer, or any resident private citizen, and they or either of them are hereby authorized and empowered, to seize or arrest any such negro or negroes, mulatto or mulattoes, or other person or persons of color, and take him, her, or them, before any one of the judges or magistrates aforesaid, and upon oath being made by such constable, officer, or resident private citizen, that he hath just and reasonable grounds to believe that such negro, &c., as the case may be, hath escaped from his, her, or their owner or owners in some other of the United States or Territories, it shall then be the duty of the judge or magistrate aforesaid, and they, and each of them, are hereby required, to commit such negro or negroes, mulatto, or other person or persons of color, to the public jail of the district or county where he, she, or they shall be found and apprehended, for the space of — months, unless the owner or owners shall in a shorter time prove a right of property thereto; and it shall be the duty of the keeper of any jail to which such fugitives shall be committed, to give public notice thereof in some public newspaper for the space of — weeks; describing particularly the fugitive or fugitives so committed.

It was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hardin, Macon, Mason of Virginia, Ruggles, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Troup, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Brown Daggett, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lacock, Mason of New Hampshire, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Sanford, Thompson, Tichenor, Varnum, Wells, and Wilson.

And the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole having been concurred in, in part, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" on motion by Mr. TALBOT, it was agreed to take the question by yeas and nays.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report to the Senate a bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, to the number of five thousand men, to consist of such proportions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, as the President of the United States shall deem proper, retaining the corps of engineers as at present established.

Mr. MASON said, that being convinced by a deliberate examination of the subject that the present Military Peace Establishment of ten thousand men was greater than the circumstances of the country required, he deemed it his duty to submit this resolution to the consideration of the Senate.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

Military Peace Establishment.

SENATE.

That he had delayed doing it earlier in the session, through an expectation that a similar proposition, presented to the House of Representatives, would have been acted on by that body. But as the House of Representatives had, without discussing the merits of that proposition, passed an appropriation bill for the expenses of the military service of the present year, it seemed proper that the Senate, before they agreed to that bill, should determine whether those expenses could not, consistently with the public interest, be lessened, by reducing the Military Establishment.

He admitted that protection from insult and violence being one of the chief objects of political society, it was the duty of all Governments to provide sufficient means for such protection; and that our Government, as well as all others, ought to have a military force sufficiently powerful to insure the safety of the country. But (he said) it is not necessary for the safety of the country, nor consistent with the principles of our system of Government, that this force should, in times of peace, consist principally of a standing army. A free Government, established by general consent, and maintained for the general welfare, will always find a sufficient resource against domestic violence in the affections and good will of its citizens. It is for defence against foreign enemies alone that this Government can ever need a standing army.

That standing armies, in free Governments, maintained in times of peace, are dangerous to the rights and liberties of the people, has been the doctrine of the wisest and best statesmen as long as free Governments have existed. Such is the jealousy of the people of Great Britain on this subject, that the maintaining of their army is never authorized by law for a longer period than one year. An act of Parliament is annually passed for the continuance of the army during the year, and fixing its numbers. Thus each branch of the Legislature always retains the power of reducing or wholly annihilating the army at pleasure.

In a country where the public defence is entirely intrusted to a regular army, it will never be held necessary that the mass of the people should be accustomed to the use of arms; and where the use of arms is confined to those who make it their profession, it is sufficiently apparent that the unarmed people, however numerous, can make but feeble resistance, when the arms, which they supposed intended for their protection, are turned against them.

So strong was that jealousy in this country, at the period of our Revolution, that it is expressly asserted in the constitutions of many of the States, that standing armies are dangerous to the liberties of the people, and that they ought not to be kept up in time of peace. This principle, thus solemnly recognised, was not intended to be abolished, by granting to Congress the power to raise armies. The end for which that power was granted was the defence of the country in time of war, and for no other purpose can it be justly exercised.

At this time there may be no sufficient cause for apprehending immediate dangers of the kind alluded to, from the present army. Perhaps its comparatively small number, a just confidence in the character of its officers, and the temper of the times, afford at present satisfactory security. But unless the army be strictly confined to the number necessary for its only justifiable use, it can have no certain limitation. And the same arguments which may now be used to justify or excuse the increase of the establishment beyond its true limits, may hereafter be urged with equal success for a much greater increase.

But the most important objection against the existing Military Establishment, is the great expense, which affords of itself a sufficient inducement for reducing the Army as low as the safety of the country will permit. In modern warfare, national wealth is essentially national strength. With a view, therefore, to public safety alone, whatever tends unnecessarily to the impoverishment of the public Treasury, should be cautiously avoided.

The question then is, whether a standing army of ten thousand men is necessary at the present time for the safety of the country against foreign aggression?

No exemption from a state of war, the common calamity of nations, is claimed for our country. A nation, which should depend on its justice and moderation alone for protection, would be compelled to submit not only to degrading insults, but also in the end to surrender to foreign cupidity and ambition its essential rights. To insure the enjoyment of our rights, a military force sufficient for their defence is necessary. In time of war, this force, as is generally admitted, ought to consist to a considerable extent of a regular standing army. The size of the army must of course be determined by the circumstances of the war in which we may be engaged. The policy of maintaining a certain portion of a regular army, in time of peace likewise, is not questioned.

It may not be easy to determine with exact precision what ought to be the extent of such a Peace Establishment. Our safest guide is our own past experience. Such is the difference in the circumstances of our country, and of the countries of Europe, that we can derive little instruction from their examples. They are surrounded by ambitious neighbors, against whose enterprises they are obliged constantly to guard. Instead of training the people to the use of arms, and relying on them for protection, the Governments there not only depend on their armies for defence against foreign invasion, but also for retaining their own subjects in obedience. Separated as we are by a great distance from the nations, with whom we may expect collisions, we shall always have sufficient notice of any intended attacks to enable us to make the necessary preparations for defence.

The only service we have for regular troops, in time of peace, is to defend the Western frontier, and preserve from decay and ruin our fortifications. If the Peace Establishment be not limited to the number, requisite for these objects, it will not be easy to fix any bounds to it, till we arrive at the point that forms the rule of many European Governments; which is, to increase the military force as far as there is ability to bear the expense. Should we determine to maintain, in peace, an army sufficiently large to defend the country in war, the present establishment will be found entirely inadequate. Our remote situation, and the well established character of our people, are a sufficient security against invasion, for the purpose of permanent conquest. With a seacoast of more than two thousand miles, intersected by many deep bays and rivers, the country cannot be protected against depredations by any other than a naval force. This is demonstrated by our experience during the two wars in which we have been engaged with Great Britain. It is impossible by fortifications and a land force, however extensive, to secure the country against the plundering expeditions of an enemy possessing the uncontrolled dominion of the ocean. Our principal towns and harbors may, by fortifications, be secured in some measure against sudden attacks. But the attempt would be idle by such means to defend our whole coast.

The acquiring and retaining military knowledge and discipline, for the future occasions of the country, is often urged as an argument in favor of the present Army Establishment. It may be doubted whether the present establishment tends much to the promotion of that object. Dispersed in small bodies as the troops now are, throughout the vast extent of the country, neither military knowledge will be acquired, nor discipline enforced. Indeed, little dependence can be placed on an army that has indulged in the idle habits in which all armies will indulge, during a long period of peace. This has been the common experience of all nations, accustomed to keep up their armies during peace, and was strongly exemplified in the total discomfiture of the Prussian army at the battle of Jena.

The present is a period of general peace throughout the world. The great Powers of Europe, fatigued and exhausted by a warfare of unexampled fury and extent, seem disposed to secure to themselves a state of peace and repose. Except the contest between Spain and her colonies in South America, no war exists among any of the nations with whom we have connexions. Judging from present appearances, we are in less danger of being soon involved in war, than we have been at any former period of our national existence.

We have no considerable misunderstanding with any nation, except Spain. The information of the state of our negotiations with that Government, lately communicated to the Senate by the President, certainly exhibits no symptoms of war. The subjects of the negotiation are all ancient: our claim of indemnification for the interruption, twenty years ago, of our right of deposit at New Orleans; a like indemnification for spoiliations on our commerce during the domination of Bonaparte; the settlement of boundaries, and proposals for the exchange of certain territories, are the subjects of the existing negotiation. Whatever may be our opinions of the merits of these claims, there is little reason to fear they will occasion a war. Had we intended to have waged war against Spain for these causes, we might have begun it eight years ago, with as much justice as we now can, and certainly with superior advantages. If, then, we do not intend to make war against Spain, is there any reason to believe that Spain meditates a war against this country? During the late European war, Spain has been more reduced and impoverished than any other nation. She has not only suffered greatly in her wealth and resources, but seems not to have profited by the occasion, to improve her military character and institutions. Is it then probable that Spain, thus reduced, and while engaged in a conflict with her colonies, of vital importance and doubtful issue, will unnecessarily commence a war against this country? Will she not perceive that a war with us would insure the independence of her colonies? It would be deemed an act of madness for that nation, standing alone and unaided, to make war on us. And there is no appearance of a disposition, in any Power of Europe, to aid or sustain her in the undertaking. We are in but little more danger of a war with Spain, than with Naples, against which Power we have a similar claim for spoliation on our commerce.

With such prospects the Military Peace Establishment may with propriety be fixed as low, as it probably ever can be, at any future period. We have no reasons to flatter ourselves with the hope that the time will ever arrive when this nation will have less occasion for a large standing army. Nor is it apparent, from the circumstances of the present time, that we now need a larger army, than at any former period, since the formation of our Government. About the time of the commencement of our present Government, the war began, which continued till lately to agitate and convulse all the nations of Europe. At several periods of that great conflict, this nation sensibly felt the danger of being drawn within the vortex. Does our safety require, at the present time, a larger military force than was found to be sufficient for those periods?

Whenever we refer, for instruction, to the course pursued during the early years of this Government, we are always surprised by the simplicity and economy of those times, when compared with the present. In no department will this difference be found greater than in the military.

The first act of Congress regulating the military department passed in the year 1790, and expressly provides that the whole number of men, to be at any time retained in service, shall not exceed twelve hundred and sixteen. In a subsequent year, a regiment of infantry, to consist of nine hundred and twelve men, was added to the establishment. In 1794, an addition was made to the corps of artillery, with a provision that the whole corps should not exceed nine hundred and ninety-two. In several subsequent years, during the misunderstanding between this country and France, Congress, by various acts, authorized the raising of additional numbers of troops. The acts, passed during that period, usually devolved on the President the power of raising a specified number of troops, if in his judgment the exigency of the times should render it necessary.

In the year 1802, the Military Peace Establishment was fixed at the number of three thousand and forty men, exclusive of commissioned officers. At that number it remained, till the difficulties occurred which led to the late war with Great Britain. Some pains have been taken to ascertain the number of troops in service during the first twenty years of this Government. It cannot be determined, with much certainty, from any returns or documents in the office of the Adjutant General. It is, however, confidently believed that the average number, during those twenty years, could not have exceeded three thousand.

This opinion is confirmed by an examination of the expenditures for the military service of those years.

From the statements of the Treasury Department, it appears, that the whole expenditure for the military service, including the Indian department, during the first twenty years of the Government, did not amount to twenty-nine millions of dollars. So that the average of annual expenditures, during those years, was less than one million and an half. The average annual expenditure, for three years subsequent to 1802, when the Military Peace Establishment was fixed, was only eight hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars. During the first twenty years, the Government was engaged in several expensive Indian wars, was compelled to put down by military force an extensive insurrection, and encountered heavy expenses, in preparation for a war with France. Where is the necessity for having, in the present time of general peace, a greater Military Establishment than was deemed sufficient for the security of the country, during that period of general warfare throughout the continent of Europe? Yet the number of troops now retained is more than three times what it then was, and the authorized expenditure for military service more than four times what it then was.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report on the state of the finances, estimates the authorized expenditure for the military service of the present year at $6,459,625. This sum, as being necessary for the military service, he includes in his estimates of the permanent expenditures of future years. In this sum is understood to be included $800,000 for fortifications, and certain sums for ordnance stores. But those sums were also in the estimates of the last year, and are considered by the Secretary as permanently necessary, according to the present system, for the annual military service.

Such a great and sudden increase in the numbers and expenses of the Military Establishment, makes it the duty of Congress to lessen it, if it may be done consistently with the public safety. There is not, as is believed, a nation in the world whose military force in proportion to its numbers is so expensive as ours. Supposing the regiments and corps full, which is seldom the case, the average expense for each man would be six hundred and fifty dollars a year. And, after deducting such parts of the gross sum as are expended in fortifications and ordnance stores, which remain at the end of the year, the average expense for each man would still be at least five hundred and fifty dollars a year.

From our past experience and from estimates, which may be relied on, it may be safely asserted that we can maintain a navy, with ten thousand seamen, in constant service, and including all expenses of building and repairing the ships, for a less sum than is now expended for the same number of land forces. The estimated expense of building and equipping a seventy-four gun ship is $384,000, of a forty-four gun frigate $263,000. The whole annual expense of keeping in service a seventy-four gun ship, including the ordinary repairs, with a full crew of six hundred and fifty-six men, is estimated at $189,000. A frigate with four hundred and fifty men, at $134,000. Supposing the vessels to last only ten years, the whole expense of building and equipping the vessels and keeping them in service, that term of time, with their full crews of eleven hundred and six men, would be $3,882,000. The expense of maintaining the same number of regular troops in the Peace Establishment, for the same period of time, at the estimated expense of five hundred and fifty dollars a year for each man, would amount to more than six millions of dollars.

No one, who recollects the events of the late war, can doubt the superior advantages to this country of a naval over a land force, whether for purposes of defence or offence. Had we possessed, at the commencement of that war, a competent naval force, not only our own coast might have been protected against predatory expeditions, but the vast commerce of our enemy, together with her valuable West India possessions, would have been at our mercy; for this country a naval force is the cheapest and most efficient, is the most congenial to the principles of our Government, least dangerous to the rights of the people, and consequently least obnoxious to their jealousy.

There is no occasion for keeping in service, in time of peace, more regular troops than are necessary to guard the Western frontier, and take care of the forts and garrisons. I believe (said Mr. M.) half the present number sufficient for those purposes. No inconvenience was experienced for the want of troops during the time while only three thousand were retained in service. In my judgment, therefore, the Military Peace Establishment ought to be reduced to five thousand men, the one-half its present number. I believe it would be consistent with the safety, and in furtherance of the best interests of the country. The saving to the Treasury that would be made, which would exceed two and a half millions of dollars a year, might be applied, partly, to a further increase of the Navy, and partly towards a more speedy extinguishment of the national debt.

Proceedings.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

TUESDAY, February 18.

Mr. FROMENTIN, from the Joint Library Committee, reported the following resolutions, which were read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to cause to be erected and fitted up for the reception of the Library of Congress a suitable building, upon a plan to be approved by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, to be situated on Delaware avenue, north of the Capitol.

Resolved, That when the said building shall be ready for the reception of the said library, it shall be the duty of the Librarian to remove the same and arrange the books therein.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the petition of William Hargrave, praying the privilege of entering with the register of the land office east of Pearl river, the tract of land on which he resides, not exceeding four hundred and eighty acres, as designated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

On motion, by Mr. RUGGLES, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Fort Wayne, in the State of Ohio, to Chicago, in the State of Indiana.

On motion, by Mr. CHACE, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court; and no amendment having been proposed, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

WEDNESDAY, February 19.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph C. Boyd, made the following report:

That the petitioner was a Paymaster in the Army, and, on the 9th of March, 1813, he intrusted to Captain Joseph Westcott the sum of $1,374 35, to pay said Westcott's company, then stationed at Castine, in the District of Maine. Captain Westcott left Portland in the sloop Harriet of Portland, Jacob Orcutt, master, and, on the day he sailed, dropped the money overboard, and was deprived of the means of recovering it by a rough sea. Mutilated duplicate receipts, given by Captain Westcott to the Paymaster for the sum in question, are in the Accountant's office. It appears the usage has been, and is still continued, of the Paymasters sending their remittances to the officers of posts by such conveyances as they may select; it is, however, understood to be at the risk of the Paymaster. In this case, very full evidence is given that the loss was accidental, though the loose manner in which Captain Westcott was carrying the money was blameable. The effect of relieving the petitioner to the United States is the payment of the money twice.

The committee are of opinion that, however severely the withholding relief may press upon the petitioner, the precedent such a grant would establish would be of the most evil tendency. It seems unwise to adopt any measure that would encourage remissness in the transmission of moneys by Paymasters. The following resolution is respectfully submitted, viz:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Ewell, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Otis, attorney of William Otis, late collector of the customs of the district of Barnstable, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. DANA, from the committee to whom was referred the motion submitted by Mr. FROMENTIN on the 14th instant, with instructions relating to the journals, made a report, which was read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 17th instant for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill to the Senate to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; and, on motion, by Mr. KING, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Friday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 17th instant, for instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, or cause to be erected, suitable buildings for custom-houses and public ware-houses, for the safe and convenient collection of the revenue of the United States, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions of the 17th instant, for instructing the Committee on Finance to report to the Senate a bill providing for the establishment of a bank within the City of Washington, upon certain conditions, and to report a bill prohibiting, after a certain time, the making and issuing, by any unauthorized association or individual, within the District of Columbia, notes or bills, with intent to cause the same to be circulated and received in payment; and, on motion by Mr. GOLDBOROUGH, the further consideration was postponed until the fourth day of March next.

The bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale or to be held to labor, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to provide for reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court was read a third time, and the blanks were filled, first with 1,000, second with 80; and on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hanson, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Noble, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thompson, Tichenor, and Troup.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Lacock, Macon, Roberts, Varnum, and Wilson.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act to provide for reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court."

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of Aquilla M. Bolton and Amos J. Yarnall, executors of Lieutenant John J. Yarnall, late of the United States Navy, praying relief in the settlement of his accounts, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHACE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill to provide for the punishment of crimes and offences committed within the Indian boundaries; reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. FROMENTIN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States a sum equal to the salary of the judge of the district court of South Carolina, for the term of one year, during which time the said circuit judge was compelled, by law, to perform the duties of the judge of said district court.

Mr. CHACE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked and obtained leave to report a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the courts of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CHACE, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, it was agreed that the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act concerning the navigation of the United States," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Foreign Relations be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the petition of Jesse Beau, representing that he has lately discovered a silver mine in the Missouri Territory, and praying the privilege of working the same for five years, on conditions stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The bill entitled "An act relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

The resolution directing a building to be erected for the use of the Library of Congress, was read the second time.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be reported to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, such measures as he may deem most effectual for the security of the country watered by the Chesapeake bay and its tributary streams, against the maritime force of an enemy.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill respecting persons escaping from the service of their masters.

On motion of Mr. TALBOT, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow week, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hardin, Hunter, King, Macon, Mason of Virginia, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Thompson, and Troup.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Chace, Hanson, Horsey, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Taylor, Tichenor, Varnum, and Wilson.

On motion, by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the Metropolis; of the President and Directors of the Patriotic Bank of Washington; and of the President and Directors of the Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington, respectively praying charters of incorporation, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and they were severally referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the members of the Columbian Institute; and, on motion by Mr. WILSON, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the fourth day of March next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee. Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair; and the amendments having been agreed to, with an additional amendment, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair, and the bill was reported to the House accordingly. And the amendments having been concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate a copy of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government of Spain, relative to the subjects of controversy between the two nations, except such parts as he may deem improper to disclose.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Postmaster General, of the unproductive post roads for the year 1816; and the report was read.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW, the further consideration of the bill to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the vine and other exotic plants thereon, was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, tomorrow.

THURSDAY, February 20.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Union Bank of Alexandria, praying an act of incorporation, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, also presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, praying an extension of their charter, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the same committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MASON also presented the petition of Alicia Carter, relict of William B. Carter, who died in the service of his country during the late war, previous to his being mustered, praying for relief, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TAFT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Yarnall, deceased; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. TAFT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Edward Shubrick and others, officers of the late United States' brig Chippewa, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorialists have leave to withdraw their memorial.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, presented the memorial of the merchants of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and its vicinity, who have suffered from the depredations of French cruisers; representing, that during the wars in Europe which arose out of the French Revolution, their property, while engaged in lawful commerce, was subjected to capture and condemnation by the cruisers of the French Republic, upon the most frivolous pretences; that for these aggressions they had a claim upon the justice of the French Government, which they had urged with some success, but that by the convention of September 30, 1800, the claim of American citizens for indemnity for such captures was relinquished, in consideration of certain great political advantages in favor of the United States, whereby they conceive the United States are bound to discharge those claims which they prevented their citizens from obtaining abroad; and praying compensation therefor, and that such measures may be pursued as will secure to them an indemnity from the Government of France for the depredations of French cruisers since the ratification of the convention of September 30, 1800; and the memorial was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, for requesting the President of the United States to cause to be reported to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, such measures as he may deem most effectual for the security of the country watered by the Chesapeake Bay against the maritime force of an enemy; and on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the 4th day of March next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, for requesting a copy of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government of Spain, relative to the controversy between the two nations, except such part as may be deemed improper to disclose, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, a certain compensation for having performed the duties of the judge of the district court of South Carolina; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph C. Boyd; and in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Ewell; and, in concurrence therewith, it was resolved that the prayer of the petitioner is unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

The bill in addition to an act entitled "An act for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the courts of the United States," was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act concerning the navigation of the United States," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly, and the amendments having been concurred in with further amendments, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to set apart and dispose of certain lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine, and other exotic plants thereon. Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair, and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair, and it was reported to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Chace, Condit, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Sanford, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Troup, Varnum, Wells, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Daggett, Hardin, Mason of New Hampshire, Ruggles, and Smith.

ALTERATION OF THE JOURNAL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the motion submitted by Mr. FROMENTIN, on the 14th instant, with instructions in relation to the journal, as follows:

"That before the statement of the motion of Mr. Barbour, on which the question was taken by yeas and nays, on Thursday the 13th instant, as recorded in the journal of that day, it would be proper to state the reading of the entries, prepared by the Secretary of the Senate, for a journal of the preceding day, with reference to the counting of votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

"In the opinion of the Committee, a fair view of the question on which the yeas and nays were taken, may be presented in the following mode of stating the fact, viz:

"The entries prepared by the Secretary of the Senate for a journal of proceedings, on Wednesday the 12th instant, with reference to the counting of votes for President and Vice President of the United States, were read in the words following:

"The two Houses of Congress agreeably to the joint resolution, assembled in the Representatives' Chamber, and the certificates of the Electors of the several States, beginning with the State of New Hampshire, were, by the President of the Senate, opened and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, by whom they were read, except the State of Indiana; and when the certificate of the Electors of that State was opened, an objection was made by Mr. Taylor, a member of the House of Representatives, from the State of New York, on the ground 'that the votes of the Electors of the State of Indiana, for President and Vice President of the United States, (having been given previous to the admission of that State into the Union) ought not to be received and counted.'

"Whereupon, on motion, by Mr. VARNUM, the Senate returned to their own Chamber; and the following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Dougherty their Clerk:

"Mr. President: The House of Representatives is ready to proceed to make out and complete a list of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the 11th instant."

"The two Houses of Congress having again assembled in the Representatives' Chamber, and the certificate of the Electors of the State of Indiana having been opened by the President of the Senate, was delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the whole number of votes, presented a list thereof to the President of the Senate, which was read as follows:

STATES.	President.		For Vice President.
	James Monroe, of Virginia.	Rufus King, of New York.	Daniel D. Tompkins, of N. Y.	John E. Howard, of Maryland.	James Ross, of Pennsylvania.	John Marshall, of Virginia.	Robert C. Harper, of Maryland.

"The whole number of votes being 217, of which 109 make a majority.

"Whereupon, Mr. Barbour, submitted the following motion, which was read and considered:

"Resolved, That the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate on yesterday, so far as they are connected with the service of counting the ballots for President and Vice President of the United States, be made up in conformity to the precedents heretofore established in similar cases."

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. DANA, the yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative, are Messrs. Chace, Dana, Fromentin, Lacock, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Sanford, Tait, Taylor, Tichenor, and Varnum.

Those who voted in the negative, are Messrs. Ashmun, Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hanson, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Stokes, Talbot, Williams, and Wilson.

And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

Mr. VARNUM was requested to take the Chair, and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair; and the bill was reported to the House accordingly. And, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Acting Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 22d instant, "requesting him to lay before the Senate the probable amount of the claim of the State of Maryland, for militia services during the late war, and such information as he may be in possession of on that subject;" and the report was read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817;" and after progress, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act directing the transfer of unclaimed pensions, and limiting the payment at the Treasury only;" a bill entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act granting bounties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers,' passed 5th March, 1816," a bill entitled "An act making an appropriation for opening and cutting out a road therein described;" also, a bill entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The four bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act freeing from postage all letters and packets to and from James Madison;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill compensating Peter Haguer; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WELLS presented the petition of Isaac Briggs, praying relief in the settlement of his accounts, as surveyor of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee; and compensation for exploring and ascertaining the topography of a post route from Washington City to New Orleans, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Enoch Barnum, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RUGGLES also presented the petition of Alexander Patterson, of Jefferson county, in the State of Ohio, who was a second lieutenant in the Army of the United States, during the late war with Great Britain, praying relief in consideration of his having been severely wounded while in the discharge of his duty, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

TUESDAY, February 25.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to examine and report to their respective Houses what business is pending before them, and what is indispensable to act upon previous to their adjournment, and have appointed a committee on their part; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution last mentioned was read three times by unanimous consent, and concurred in, and Mr. WILSON and Mr. TAIT were appointed the committee on their part.

The PRESIDENT communicated the general account of the Treasurer of the United States from the 1st of April, 1815, to the 1st of January, 1816, as also the accounts of the War and Navy Departments, from the 1st of October, 1815, to the 1st of October, 1816, together with the reports thereon; which were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Folley, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner be disallowed.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate, and

Clerk of the House of Representatives, be directed, in making any future contract for the printing of Congress, to stipulate and require that the same, excepting only the bills, or when otherwise specially directed by either House, shall be done in a royal octavo form, the size of the pages to be the same as those of the late edition of the Laws of the United States; and that when any table will not admit, with the use of the smaller type, of compression into that size, they shall be so printed as to fold conveniently into the volume.

Ordered, That it pass to the second reading.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1817, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act respecting the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army of the United States," reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes,'" reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. ROBERTS submitted the following resolution; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Resolved, That Robert Tweedy, Tobias Simpson, and George Hicks, assistants to the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, be paid, out of the contingent fund, two dollars a day for each day they may have attended the Senate during the present session of Congress; and that Charles Tims be allowed one hundred dollars for his attendance during the present session.

Mr. CHACE presented the memorial of Nathaniel Cutting, praying a grant of a tract of land in the reservation of military bounty lands, in consideration of his long and faithful public services; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The bill authorizing a subscription for an additional volume of the laws of the United States, and for the distribution thereof, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, on motion by Mr. VARNUM, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The amendments to the bill entitled "An act to amend the act 'authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,'" passed the ninth of April, 1816," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed with amendments.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who were instructed, by a resolution of the Senate, to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of the postmaster at Newark, New Jersey. Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to increase the compensation of the postmaster at Newark, in New Jersey.

The bill entitled "An act freeing from postage all letters and packets to and from James Madison," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia, was read the second time.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, submitted sundry statements of the situation of the affairs of those banks: and, on his motion, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for to-morrow; and the statements ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of William B. Carter; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of a tract of land in the reservation at the lower rapids of Sandusky, was read the second time.

The bill authorizing a subscription for the printing of the tenth volume of public documents, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to set apart and pledge as a permanent fund for internal improvements, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States' share of its dividends."

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order for to-morrow.

The bill to establish post roads was read the second time.

The bill to prevent the discontinuance of the business of the Supreme Court in certain cases, was read the second time.

The bill compensating Peter Hagner was read the second time.

The bill entitled an act to amend an act, entitled "An act granting bounties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers," passed 5th March, 1816, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled "An act making an appropriation for making and cutting out a road therein described," was read the second time, and referred to the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to roads and canals, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled "An act directing the transfer of unclaimed pensions, and limiting their payment at the Treasury only;" was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817; and after further progress, on motion by Mr. TROUP, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pension of Randolph Clarkson.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee, and, on motion by Mr. STOKES, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 17th instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to report to the Senate a bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; and the same having been amended, by leaving the number a blank, by striking out the word "five," and inserting after "engineers," in the last line "and of topographical engineers;"

Mr. BARBOUR moved the postponement of the resolution to the 4th of March next.

I cannot forbear (Mr. B. said) to express my surprise that a measure of such importance should be brought forward at the very termination of the session, when it is palpable the few remaining days will be entirely insufficient for the ordinary but indispensable business of legislation.

Has any event occurred whose effects have placed this subject on a footing different from that on which it stood at the commencement of the session? If it has, let us hear it, if not, how will the gentleman account for the delay? How has it happened that he has not brought it before the Senate at an earlier period, when it might have received that full discussion and deliberate decision in both branches of the Legislature which its importance, and I will add a respect for the Army itself, imperiously required. It is known to you also, Mr. President, that the other House has already refused to consider this subject. No beneficial end can result from a further consumption of time in discussing it, and hence I have made the motion just submitted. Not having intended to take any part in the debate to-day, on the merits of the question of disbanding the Army, I feel a reluctance in involving myself in the discussion, particularly when I know how formidable is my antagonist, and when I perceive, too, that he has armed himself at all points with dates, and facts, and calculations, to sustain him in his onset; yet, seeing no other gentleman about to rise, I cannot remain silent, and permit his remarks to be entirely unanswered.

The honorable gentleman commences by de.

claring that standing armies are incompatible with the theory of the Government and the feelings of the people. It is true, sir, when they are unnecessarily kept on foot, and from their extent, are calculated to excite just apprehensions, that they may be turned against the liberties of their country. This sentiment I feel as strongly as any man in the Republic, and would most zealously, were it necessary, cherish its growth. But it is not, sir; it is as old as the hills, derives strength from the uniform and disastrous result in every nation which has been unfortunate and improvident enough to try it, and has become a settled axiom in the creed of every republican. But can it be seriously said, when reference is had to the vast and almost boundless extent of our territory, and the state of the world in general, and our own particular relations especially, that the small Army we have is either unnecessary or in any degree dangerous to liberty? Sir, when our military force is divided among the various garrisons, scattered from Maine to Orleans, he must indeed be most easily affrighted who sees anything in such a force unfriendly to our free institutions.

The gentleman, indeed, says that the regular increase of our Military Establishment furnishes just cause of alarm. Is not this the inseparable concomitant of extended empire, and the vast expansion of our affairs?

At the commencement of our Government, our revenue did not exceed $3,000,000; the last year it was but little short of $50,000,000. Our territory has been more than doubled, our population quadrupled, and our resources, individual and national, multiplied in a ratio which almost eludes calculation. What would have been excessive then, is moderate now. Then we were the infant Hercules, rocked in his cradle; now we are the full-grown man, successfully contending with the fifty-headed hydra.

The gentleman tells you his measure, if successful, will diminish your expenditures, and consequently your taxes—popular language generally. But a wise Government, exercising a prudent foresight, and fulfilling the just expectation of a free and enlightened people, will encounter a present sacrifice for a commensurate future good. I think, however, the gentleman's calculations are entirely erroneous as to the reduction proposed. The real amount necessary to keep up the present establishment, is not as is represented upwards of $6,000,000—it does not exceed between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. The error results from the blending expenses for other objects with the support of the Army. Arsenal, fortifications, arms, munitions, &c., ought not to be charged to the Army; it is not compatible with fair argument so to do; and yet it is by this mode of calculation the gentleman is brought to this result of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. Whatever may be the deduction, the saving will not be in proportion to the number dismissed of an army. As it is necessary for even the skeleton of an army to have a staff of considerable extent, the saving could not exceed $1,500,000. But let the cost or the saving be what it may, if the present force be necessary, it must be kept up. That it is necessary, I proceed to show. You are surrounded, to say nothing of numerous warlike tribes of Indians, by two powerful neighbors. We are, it is true, at peace with both. With one no serious difficulties exist, and I therefore pray that the existing peace may long be maintained; with the other it cannot be disguised that there are subjects of controversy of no small importance. When I speak of Spain as a powerful nation, I do not mean to convey the idea that she is so, of herself; far from it. In a contest between her and the United States, boasting apart, I should be far from appreciating very highly a victory over her by sea or land. But should it so happen that a powerful nation, Great Britain for example, were to unite with her, and make it a common cause, she, from that circumstance, would be justly entitled to the character of a powerful nation. That Great Britain would so unite, seems probable. I do not mean to sport with her character; yet, speaking with the freedom of history, there is no difficulty in saying that she never permits a war to be waged, no matter where or about what, without becoming, if not a principal, at least an ally.

I am far from saying that there is a probability of war with Spain; on the contrary, I hope that the councils of Spain, directed by moderation, integrity and wisdom, will remove the causes of discord which at this time unhappily separate us. But if other views should be entertained, the United States can feel no difficulty in joining in any contest which it may be the pleasure of Spain to produce. I, for one, am free to admit that I augur nothing favorable from the omens of the time. What has the Spaniard proposed? The cession of half your Empire; for such in effect will be the result of establishing the Mississippi as the boundary. Nay, if he means anything, his pretensions are still more audacious. He proposes the principle of uti possidetis in 1792, and suggests this with the more confidence as it was the principle assumed by the crowned heads of Europe. Why mention the one or the other? I abjure both their authority and example. But what imparts the most importance to this subject, is, that this proposition comes from Spain. Can this be her own language, or is she speaking as prompted by another? Is her presumption the effect of her ignorance of our character, or is she emboldened by assurances of support? Is it impossible that Great Britain may have told her that the whole force of her Empire is at her service, should war ensue between us? As to our course, it is unimportant what are her motives or what her object. Let us be ready, whatever may be the direction this unpleasant subject is destined to take. Can this be the fit time to disband our Army? Is a disbanded army the instrument of negotiation, with which you mean to arm your Minister? Would Talleyrand ever have been dubbed a prince for his adroitness in diplomacy, if he had not been supported by fifty thousand bayonets, directed by the most extraordinary genus which the world has ever seen? Are the Senate sincere in wishing peace? Its continuance can be preserved only by being ready for war. This is a precept left as a legacy by the Father of his Country; which, together with many other no less instructive lessons left by him, might be beneficially read by modern politicians. We have not only this strong sanction to the propriety of the doctrine, but it results from daily observation. It applies equally to individuals and to nations. He who is prompt to resent an insult, and ready to punish it, usually escapes a wanton aggression. When France was governed by the imperial sceptre, how lasting might have been her peace, but for the restless spirit of her chief! How was every word and every act, towards her, weighed in the scales of caution and of fear? Take the reverse of the picture: the passive subject of injury, the one or the many, it matters not, becomes a football, kicked about by cowardice itself. The honorable gentleman, however, treats lightly the possibility of any serious result to our differences with Spain, and considers the world as hushed into general and lasting repose. Whatever may be the result of our controversy, I beg leave to differ with him as to the repose of Europe. She reposes on combustible materials; the spark is all that is necessary to light up again the flames of war. It is not in the nature of things that Frenchmen can be content with their present condition. The restless aspiration of a Frenchman for the grandeur of his country; the thoughts of glory past, and present shame, will forever keep alive a galling recollection. In such a soil peace can never take root. The first favorable moment will be seized to break their fetters. And France has already given tremendous proofs of the power of a recently regenerated nation. I affect not the spirit of prophecy; nor should I have ventured to indulge a conjecture as to the future, had not the example been furnished me by the honorable gentleman. But, independently of the course of events abroad, there is one consideration which I wish to press particularly on the mind of the Senate; it is, that the present establishment, considering the discipline of the troops, but still more the military talents and experience of the officers, is a most invaluable possession. It is a nucleus around which, should there be occasion, an army, to any extent our exigencies might require, could be immediately formed. A short time only would be necessary to impart the discipline of the old to the new army. Rumor ascribes the victory of Napoleon at Leipsic, to his dispersing his veterans through his battalions of fresh recruits. They gave confidence to their associates; became their guides, and led on to victory. But the honorable gentleman tells you that a peace army is worse than useless; that they sleep for years together, and at the commencement of a war are entirely unfitted for the field. He is led to this result from our own experience during the last war, and also from the fall of Prussia.

The officers of the Peace Establishment are not among those, he says, who distinguished themselves during the war. I totally differ from the gentleman, both as to his facts and inferences. It cannot be true that the superior officers of our Army, to whom this country owes so much, have betrayed the high trust reposed in them by suffering a state of things so disgraceful to the service. No, sir, we are told that they are usefully employed in constructing military roads, barracks, fortifications, &c.; nor have I heard a suggestion, before, that they have been in the least inattentive to the discipline of their troops. The names of Gaines, of Scott, of Macomb, of Pike, and numerous others, will cancel the charge of the honorable gentleman against the officers of the Peace Establishment. As for the example of Prussia, it is singularly unfortunate for the argument of the gentleman. Prussia, by her continually keeping on foot large armies, rose from a small German principality to rank, if not among the first, certainly the second rate Powers of Europe. As to her fall, it excited no surprise at the time. The conflict was too unequal; she fought single-handed with the conqueror of Austria and of Russia, and in the moment he was flushed with victory; her fate was common to the surrounding nations, the whole of which had prostrated themselves at the footstool of Napoleon's throne. Disband your army, what becomes of your officers? As military men, lost to their country; a loss, Mr. President, of no ordinary kind; not easily replaced. It is more difficult to raise than to disband an army. Pen, ink, and paper, will do the business of the last, but no man in the Senate can better tell the difficulties of raising it than yourself. The history of the last war contains a volume of wisdom on this subject. Courage, I mean political, zeal, devotedness to country without regard to personal consequences, perseverance—these are the essential qualities in the legislator who takes upon himself the arduous task of raising an army, and taxes to support them. You know too well to make it necessary for me to repeat it, how eagerly faction or demagogues seize and turn this subject against their author.

The gentleman recommends the reduction of the Army, and that the savings may be appropriated to the Navy—our national defence. Sir, I entirely concur in the sentiment that the Navy is the strong arm of our defence. Nor is there a man, in the nation, not even the honorable Chairman, upon that subject, whose zeal for its encouragement is greater than mine. Sir, we owe the successful efforts of our Navy eternal gratitude. They not only made the enemy feel a portion of those wrongs they had so long inflicted on us with impunity, but, while they acquired lasting renown to their country, they gained for the Navy, I hope, an imperishable popularity. But let the friends of the Navy beware against this seductive promise. Let them remember, when the work of destruction begins, it may not stop with the Army, but involve both Navy and Army. Sir, I stated when I first rose, that I did not think, that the manner in which this subject had been brought forward, was, to say the least of it, at all respectful to the Army; to whose feelings I must think we owe something; and that it does not become Congress to treat them as a grazier does his cattle—so many to be slaughtered to-day, as many more to-morrow, while the balance may be permitted to remain until the ensuing year. There was a time when the feelings of this nation towards the Army were essentially different. It is a little more than two years ago when I arrived in this place to take my seat. For the first time I saw the Capitol of my country smouldering in its ruins, the torch having been applied, I must say, by a ferocious enemy. I found you most anxious and deeply interested for the fate of New Orleans; we saw in the desolation of the Metropolis her destiny, were the enemy successful. A city given up to rapine, to lust, to conflagration, and to all the unutterable horrors of unrestrained warfare, haunted the imagination. The glad tidings of victory were at length communicated. With a profound penetration of the protecting hand of Providence, was united a most affectionate regard for our deliverers. From every patriotic lip were uttered simultaneous thanks to the brave army of New Orleans, and to the courage and genius which directs it. What language can describe our emotions when tidings came of our victory at Niagara?—of the prodigies of valor displayed by our army at Erie, both in the attack and in the repulse, or of the victory on both elements at Plattsburg? We felt then gratitude to the heroes of those scenes. Has it already passed by? are their distinguished services to be so readily forgotten? are they so useless in our esteem that they are to be dismissed without discussion or without deliberation? Sir, if their services have really become unnecessary, let them be dismissed, but let it be graciously done. Such is my confidence in the highmindedness of those men, that I am sure they would be the last to wish to continue and hang like drones on society, were it prudent to disband the Army. Sir, I frequently hear prognostics of perpetual peace. I am not one of those anticipators of such halcyon days. I know of nothing which justifies our acting on such an anticipation. Why can we rationally calculate on an exemption from those calamities, which have been the lot of every people in all ages of the world? Such hopes have a seductive effect, and are calculated to paralyze effort. For one, I indulge them not; on the contrary, I shall be guided by the lessons of experience, though bitter to the taste; and, estimating, as I do, our liberty and peace, as jewels of inestimable price, I shall submit, without repining, to the sacrifice which their preservation may require. One word more, and I have done. I cherish with ardor the old republican principle, that a well-ordered militia, I mean by that disciplined and armed, is an instrument of defence the most natural for freemen. But have we at this time such an organized militia? In addition, do you not know that it has been strenuously contended for, and is to this day in certain sections of the Union, that the General Government is not authorized to call out the militia without the consent of the State authorities? It is not my doctrine; it is one I entirely abjure, both in theory and practice; yet it exists. Let us, then, not strip the Government of the force it may command, until by law we have enabled it to command what, I repeat again, is the natural defence of freemen. The postponement of this subject for a year cannot be very improvident; otherwise this measure must have been brought forward at an earlier day. At the next session we may see our way more clearly, and adapt our course to the suggestions of our best judgments, enlightened by a deliberate reflection, acting on existing circumstances. I repeat again, that I did not design to have said a word on the subject under consideration, and have risen only from a sense of duty, without doing justice, I fear, to the subject, or myself. I console myself with the reflection, that the wisdom of the Senate will compensate for every defect of mine.

Mr. BROWN, of Louisiana, expressed his surprise that the resolution now under consideration had not been offered to the Senate at an earlier period of the session. The facts now relied on as motives for the reduction of the Army, have long been in possession of the Senate. The number of men in service, the manner in which they have been stationed, and the expense of the Military Establishment, have some time past been communicated to Congress by the acting Secretary of War. To what cause, therefore, are we to attribute the delay in submitting this resolution? In a very few days the present Congress must adjourn. A great deal of important business presses upon the two branches. Committees have, with great labor, prepared reports and bills, and, unless we now act upon them, the laborious task of re-examining the same subjects must devolve upon other committees at the next session. Time is now too precious to be spent in the examination of a question so important as the one now under consideration; especially when it is most probable that no bill, growing out of this resolution, can pass during the present Congress. I, therefore, heartily approve of the motion made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and hope that this resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

As soon as the Treaty of Peace was ratified, the attention of Congress was directed to the reduction of the Army, and to the formation of a permanent Peace Establishment. A bill, having in view these objects, originated in the House of Representatives. It appeared to be generally admitted, that a large standing army, in time of peace, was expensive, unnecessary, perhaps dangerous. It was also generally admitted that some regular force was necessary to build and keep in repair our barracks, fortifications, and arsenals; to preserve our arms and munitions of war; to retain those valuable principles of military discipline, acquired by our own experience in the late contest, and to sustain the first shock, in case we should be invaded by a foreign enemy. The precise amount of this force, was a question about which much difference of opinion might be expected, and accordingly, after various propositions to fill up the bill with a number differing from six to fifteen or twenty thousand, the bill came to the Senate fixing the Peace Establishment at six thousand men.

The Senate having obtained from the Secretary of War the information believed by them necessary to form a correct opinion, and having fully discussed and maturely considered the subject, so amended the bill as to leave the Peace Establishment at fifteen thousand men, and sent it to the House of Representatives for their concurrence in the amendment. That House adhering to the original bill, a committee of conference from the two branches met, and, after much discussion, agreed that the number should be ten thousand; and the two Houses assenting, the bill passed in that form. I refer to these proceedings, Mr. President, in order to prove that the present Peace Establishment was not hastily or inconsiderately adopted, but was made a subject of minute attention and close investigation in both branches of the Legislature. It has been in existence nearly two years. Has it been complained of by the people as unnecessarily large? Have instructions from State Legislatures required that it should be reduced? Nothing of the kind has happened. If any complaints have been heard, they have been that the Army was reduced to so small a number, that it was apprehended we might lose those principles of military discipline acquired during our late war. I do not recollect to have heard a single citizen express his opinion in favor of a further reduction of the Army; many have I heard expressing their regrets that fifteen thousand had not been retained in service. I am, therefore, fully convinced that if we now reduce the Army we shall not have done so in conformity with any expression of public opinion on that subject.

Has any change taken place in our foreign relations, calculated to recommend the adoption of this resolution? With a view to meet this question, my honorable friend, the chairman of the Military Committee (Mr. WILLIAMS) has called for the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the agents of His Catholic Majesty. Mr. B. then proceeded to examine that correspondence, and remarked upon the propositions made on the part of Spain, which appeared to him extravagant and unreasonable. The object of Spain was evidently delay—procrastination. To every frank proposal made by our Government, the representative of Spain replied by complaints of the conduct of the citizens of this country, in many instances founded on the assumption of facts which had no existence, except in the minds of those who abused his confidence by the most shameful misrepresentations. When we propose the acknowledgement of our limits from the Perdido to the Rio del Norte, we are met by a proposition to accept the uti possidetis of 1763, as the basis of the negotiation. When we urge our claim for spoiliations on our commerce, committed by privateers fitted out in the ports of Spain, we are told of large armies collected in Tennessee and Kentucky, completely officered and ready to overrun His Catholic Majesty's dominions in New Spain; and we, who well know that the armies alluded to have never existed, are requested to cause them to be dispersed. When, with the most conciliatory intentions, we propose to give that interesting country between the Rio Colorado and the Rio del Norte, which I think unquestionably belongs to us, in exchange for the sandy deserts of the Floridas, the Minister answers, that what we offer to give in exchange already belongs to His Catholic Majesty; that his instructions do not authorize him to make an exchange; but that if an offer of the greater part of the State of Louisiana in exchange for Florida is made, he will recommend the subject to the consideration of the Spanish Government. From this and other views, which he took of the negotiations, Mr. B. expressed his apprehensions that the affairs in dispute with Spain were not in a train of amicable negotiation. He was afraid we should pursue the correspondence, as we had done that with Great Britain, until it had ended in war. He feared the sword would be resorted to for the settlement of our disputes with Spain. The flag of the United States must designate—their forts defend our limits. And, in case of such an event, can we find an excuse in the weakness of Spain, for disbanding or reducing our regular army, and leaving this contest to be decided by our militia? We ought to recollect, that, after going to war with Spain, we may be forced to make peace with one or more of the allied Powers. The intimacy of the connexion, which binds the Sovereigns of Europe together, may be stronger than is generally believed. It did appear to him, that, in such a state of things, common prudence, or ordinary foresight, a judicious regard for the security of the country, forbid us to adopt the resolution now before the Senate.

Mr. President, it has been said that our Army is more expensive, in proportion to its number, than that of any other country. If abuses of any kind exist in our Military Establishment, let them be corrected. If expenses have been uselessly incurred, let those expenses be curtailed. The power of reducing, within just limits, the expenses of the Army, as much belongs to Congress, as the power of reducing the number of men in the ranks; and in every reasonable measure, having this for its object, I shall cheerfully co-operate with the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire; but I cannot concur with him in the remedy proposed by his resolution. Can it be seriously contended, that this nation is unable to support an army of ten thousand men? Shall we publish to the world, that the American people are incapable of sustaining the expense of a Peace Establishment, so very inconsiderable? Has our revenue since the peace proved less productive than we expected? Or has it transcended, in amount, our most sanguine expectations? Why is the weight of this Army felt, and the impossibility of supporting it urged, for the first time, at this session, and under circumstances when we are least prepared to expect it? That a time of peace should be employed in preparing for war, is a truth which we have often heard from the lips of experienced statesmen, but the value of which was never more justly appreciated than during our late struggle with Great Britain. The disasters attending our arms; the ravages committed in different sections of the country; the expenses which attached to all our military operations; were generally attributed to that want of preparation, which was visible in everything connected with the war. How many unavailing regrets were expressed, that we had wasted the precious moments of peace, and that we had not prepared for war! It is devoutly to be wished, that the severe, but salutary, lessons we have received, may have produced permanent effects; and that, taught by the past, we may act with more foresight and wisdom in future.

The honorable gentleman has observed, that our troops are entirely useless in times of peace. Had this resolution been offered sooner, a better opportunity would have been afforded of testing the accuracy of this observation. I have, Mr. President, been informed by a highly respectable officer, who has lately visited the military stations at Plattsburg, Sackett's Harbor, Niagara, and Detroit, that our soldiers at all those positions were laboriously employed on the barracks and forts, and in other public labors, of important character and of permanent utility. I have every reason to believe that, in other positions, the soldiers are employed in a manner equally useful to the country; and when it is considered that these troops are occupied in doing the same work at five dollars a month, which if done by hirelings, in those remote positions where laborers are few, would perhaps cost thirty dollars, the argument founded on the expense of the Military Establishment loses much of its force. Roads through the lands of the United States, connecting the garrisons with the settlements, will have the effect of facilitating the supplies of the troops, and at the same time of accelerating the sales and enhancing the price of public lands. I might here enlarge upon the valuable purposes to which an army of ten thousand men might be applied, under the direction of patriotic officers and an enlightened Administration; but I forbear, because every moment of the time of the Senate is now precious, and because I hope, that, by postponing this resolution indefinitely, we shall, in another year, be furnished with reports and plans which will realize all my expectations respecting the manner of employing the troops of a free people in a season of profound tranquillity.

It has been argued, that the money expended on the Army might be employed to more advantage in augmenting our naval force. I concur with the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire in the opinion he has expressed on the importance of a respectable navy; but I believe that our means are adequate, not only to the support of our present army, but also to an augmentation of our navy, as rapid as the dearest friends of that species of defence can desire. Firm in this persuation, I am not disposed to diminish or destroy the one, in order to contribute to the premature growth of the other.

We have been told, that standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to the liberties of a free nation. That large standing armies, in times of tranquillity, have been considered by our ancestors, and are justly considered by us, as dangerous to liberty, I readily admit; and of such armies I shall never become the advocate. But can this salutary dread of large standing armies ever attach to the very small army to which the proposed reduction is intended to apply? It would seem impossible that any individual can for a moment, really feel any such alarm. Large armies, composed of mercenary troops, when stationed amongst a people ignorant of their rights, forbidden the use of arms, or, what is nearly as bad, ignorant of the use of them, are formidable—irresistible—but the Army of our country is generally composed of its native citizens, and commanded by officers whose courage and fidelity have been proved in the field, and rewarded by the gratitude of the nation. This army is divided and stationed in garrisons along the Atlantic coast, from Maine to St. Mary's, and on the west from the Lakes to New Orleans. Our citizens are well informed, and jealous of their liberties; every where armed, and acquainted with the use of arms. Can such an army conceive designs against the liberty of their country? Can such an army, so dispersed and distributed amongst so many distant stations, afford any just cause of alarm, or even jealousy, to a population of more than one million of freemen, such as I have described? I recoil from the ungenerous suspicion. It does equal injustice to the citizen and the soldier. But I dwell too long on the subject, and shall now take my seat, with an expression of my sincere wish, that our Military Establishment may be permitted to remain unchanged, until time shall have fully developed its utility.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, in reply to Mr. BROWN and Mr. BARBOUR, observed that he had already explained the reason why the resolution had not been submitted to the Senate earlier in the session; that the objection to acting on this subject, made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) would apply with equal force to a great portion of the business before the Senate, as much of it had been brought forward since this resolution: that there was no subject before Congress of greater importance to the nation; and that, if the resolution was adopted, there would be sufficient time for maturing the bill that must be brought in, which would need but few details.

Mr. M. said, the same honorable gentleman has been pleased to express doubts of the accuracy of the statement I have made of the amount of the yearly expenses of the present Military Establishment. That statement was taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the present year. If incorrect, the official documents must be erroneous. The statements of the military expenditure of former years were derived from a similar source. That a part of the present expenditure was for fortifications and ordnance stores is admitted. This was also the case with the expenditure of former years; and, it is believed, to as great an extent, in comparison with the whole sum expended. The estimated expenses of building and keeping in service ships of war were taken from detailed estimates of the Secretary of the Navy.

It has been asserted that the increase of our revenue is equal to the increase of expenses in the Military Establishment. Were the fact so, no argument could be derived from it to justify those expenses, unless it can be shown that the Establishment, to its present extent, is necessary. But, in truth, our revenue has by no means increased in an equal ratio with our military expenditure. For the period of ten years, from 1800 to 1811, the military expenditure was little more than a million and a half of dollars yearly. The average revenue of that period was about thirteen millions a year. In one of those years, (1808,) the receipts from imposts alone exceeded sixteen millions of dollars. The excessive importations of the last year have increased the amount to be received this year beyond what may be expected in future. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts from imposts, for the next year, at only twelve millions; and the whole revenue from this and all other sources, that year, at sixteen millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars only. His expectation is, that the imposts will in subsequent years be more productive, and that the permanent revenue may be estimated at twenty-two millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It ought also to be recollected, that the national debt has, by the late war, been greatly increased—amounting, at the present time, to more than one hundred and ten millions of dollars—the payment of the interest and gradual reduction of the principal of which must be provided for. There is, therefore, no just proportion in the increase of the revenue and of the military expenditure.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia has gravely stated, as a reason for not reducing the Army at the present time, that the Dey of Algiers will not observe the treaty he lately made with our Government. If that or similar reasons should be deemed sufficient, the Army will never be reduced; for surely such reasons can never be wanting. As long as the barbarous Powers on the southern coast of the Mediterranean are suffered to exist, we shall always have cause for apprehending a rupture with some of them. But, of what possible use will the Army be in a contest with those Powers? Is it in the contemplation of any one to transport our Army into Africa, to lay siege to Algiers? It must be a naval force that shall, as it now does, restrain and curb those Powers.

But the great merits of the officers is the strong ground on which a reduction of the Army is opposed. An eloquent eulogy has been pronounced on the gallantry of the officers. Their meritorious services during the war give them, as is asserted, a strong claim on the gratitude of the country.

I have said nothing in derogation of their services or merits. That they are meritorious, seems to be admitted by all. But this, in my opinion, is no sufficient reason why they should be retained, if the country has no occasion for their services. Many officers were dismissed at the conclusion of the late war, some of whom were equally meritorious with those retained. If the officers have not been sufficiently remunerated for their services, make a suitable provision for that purpose. But, why should the country, for the sake of remunerating them, be compelled to keep up, at an immense expense, a Military Establishment twice as large as is necessary?

The highest praise of the Army of our Revolution was, that, when the country was restored to peace, and no longer needed their services, they cheerfully retired to the scenes of private life. This conduct forms the trait in the character of their illustrious Chief, which has excited the admiration of the world. In the attitude of surrendering his sword, and returning to the duties of a private citizen, the wisdom of the Government has determined he shall be represented by the pencil of the artist, as an example for the instruction and imitation of future generations.

Is it intended that the officers of the present Army shall be represented in the unfavorable contrast of importuning for pay and subsistence, when no services beneficial to their country can be rendered? Surely those gallant and high-minded men disdain to have any claim, in their behalf, rested on such ground. It is for those who opposed a reduction of the Army to show that its present number is necessary for the country, not that it is convenient to the officers. They can be rewarded, if indeed further rewards are merited or claimed, in a manner less expensive to the country, and equally honorable to them.

The question was then taken, and Mr. BARBOUR's motion, to postpone to the 4th of March next, determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Gaillard, Hanson, Howell, Hunter, King, Lacock, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Tait, Taylor, Troup, Williams, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Daggett, Dana, Goldsborough, Horsey, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Smith, Thompson, Tichenor, and Varnum.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to secure, in certain cases, the bounty in land to the heirs of deceased soldiers; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting bounties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers,' passed 5th March, 1816," reported it without amendment.

SENATE.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the extension of the Columbia turnpike road, within the District of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers," reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 25th instant, for instructing the Committee on Pensions to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pension of Randolph Clarkson, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Folley: Whereupon, Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner be disallowed.

The resolution respecting the printing for Congress was read the second time.

The resolution to authorize the pay to the assistants to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper of the Senate was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of William B. Carter, was read the second time.

The engrossed bill authorizing a subscription for an additional volume of the laws of the United States, and for the distribution thereof, was read a third time; and, on motion, by Mr. VARNUM, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the 4th day of March next.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvements, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States share of its dividends.

Mr. DAGGETT moved that the further consideration thereof be postponed until the fourth day of March next.

Mr. DAGGETT said, that before he attempted to discuss the merits of the bill, he would briefly state the substance of it, and also suggest a thought or two in reply to some of the observations of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LACOCK. The bill proposes to set apart and pledge as a fund $1,500,000, to be received for granting a charter to the National Bank, and the dividends for twenty years on seven millions of stock in the bank, owned by the United States, for the purpose of constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water-courses. As the seven millions of stock was created by the United States to invest in this bank at the rate of five per cent. per annum, $350,000 must be annually raised by taxes towards this appropriation. The dividends will probably not be less than at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, and in that case will amount to $560,000. It is then a fair calculation that the whole amount thus pledged will be between twelve and thirteen millions of dollars. The bill contains none of the details for the construction, superintendence, or management of the works, or for the regulation of the expenditure of the money.

In answer to the remarks of the gentleman who had just sat down, that a great post road from Portland to New Orleans—that turnpike roads through all parts of our country, and that canals from Boston bay to St. Mary's, along the shores of the Atlantic, were objects of immense importance—Mr. D. said that he had no disposition to enter into any controversy on any of those suggestions. He however would remark, that this bill does not purport to provide for the establishment of such post road, but leaves it in the option of any State through which such road might be contemplated to prevent it. Nor is it admitted, as alleged, that such canals would be used for the transportation of commodities to and from the great commercial towns and cities in the United States. If canals were constructed according to the gentleman's ideas, the intercourse spoken of would, in all times of peace, be as it ever has been, by sea and not by inland navigation.

Having made these few remarks, he would point the attention of the Senate to some of the objections in his mind to the bill. 1st. It is not authorized by the Constitution; and, if it were, secondly, it is inexpedient. Mr. D. said that he should with much reluctance urge any objections arising out of the Constitution, for he had long since learned that the Constitution is made to change with the times. It was one thing yesterday—it is another to-day. It is to be enlarged as the nation increases in greatness and glory—it must yield to the pressing exigencies of the moment. He need not say there is no power in the Constitution expressly authorizing the Congress to construct roads and canals, and to tax the people to defray the expense. No one asserts the existence of such power. There is not a word upon the face of the instrument on the subject, except that it is declared, article one, section eight, that "the Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads." This, so far from authorizing the establishment by Congress of all roads, limits, if it bear at all on the point, the power to post roads only; otherwise it must be shown that an instrument which gives a special power over post roads, in terms, gives, by implication, a general power over all roads. Such absurdity should not be imputed to the wise men who framed this Constitution. The reverse of all this is unquestionably true. By sound rules of interpretation, the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. The Constitution declares, "The Congress shall have power to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities of the United States—to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court—to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to exercise exclusive legislation over ten miles square," &c. In the cases mentioned, is not the Congress prohibited from providing for the punishment of counterfeiting private securities, from establishing tribunals superior to the Supreme Court; from calling forth the militia to garrison forts in time of peace; and from exercising exclusive legislation over the city of Baltimore? Again. The States, at the adoption of the Constitution, possessed the entire control over all the roads and canals within their respective limits. On this point there can be no doubt. Each State always has, and now does, exercise this power. Is it taken by the express prohibition? Certainly not. Is it taken by implication? Certainly not, unless the power is given to the Congress in such manner as to preclude the exercise of it by the States, and for such an idea no one contends.

Is there a power in the General Government over roads and canals, concurrent with the power of the States? If so, it may be asked, where are the limitations of these respective powers? Or have the Congress a sovereign authority, and is that of the States subordinate? The Constitution is silent on this subject—not so, where concurrent powers may be exercised. For example, in the tenth section of article first, it is provided that the States shall lay no imposts except such as are absolutely necessary for executing their inspection laws—they may not keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, nor engage in war unless actually invaded. It is within the province of the National Government to lay duties and imposts, to keep troops and ships of war, and especially to engage in war; yet these powers in the cases specified and with the limitations prescribed, are retained by the States, and may be exercised concurrently. In the eighth section of the first article, and in the second section of the second article, there are more striking examples of concurrent powers. To the Congress, the power is given of calling forth the militia in the cases therein mentioned, and to the President the power of being their commander-in-chief when in actual service. There is also reserved to the States the power of appointing their officers and of training the militia. There may be some questions as to the precise extent of the powers of this Government and of the States over the militia, but a concurrent power is manifestly established and attempted to be defined.

Mr. D. asked again, is this measure Constitutional, because Congress may provide for the "general welfare and common defence?" If so, then an enumeration of powers was wholly unnecessary, and is worse than useless; then there is no Constitutional limit to the powers of this Government, but the discretion of the Legislature; and, in truth, such is now a very prevalent opinion, if a judgment is to be formed from the manner in which power is claimed and exercised. The instrument may be termed "the sacred charter of our liberties—our polar star," and by many other pretty names, and at the same time be practically disregarded. Again, said Mr. D., all those internal and municipal regulations, of every description, which contribute to promote the strength and prosperity of the community, are provisions for the "common defence and general welfare." The Congress, then, may construct and support roads, bridges, and canals; regulate manufactures and agriculture; establish schools, academies, and colleges; enact wise laws for the suppression of sin—for the preservation of morals—for the punishment of all offenders, and thus assume all the powers of legislation. Then, indeed, our Union would be strengthened, as mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LACOCK); our State authorities broken down, and our Government consolidated.

Will the power in question be claimed by that part of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce between the States? If so, to regulate commerce, means to promote, to facilitate, to secure it by all discreet measures, and the bill seems to have been framed in reference to such an exposition. Inspection laws are useful to promote commerce between States, and yet laws of this character have never been attempted by Congress; on the contrary, the States have the power, by irresistible implication, of enacting inspection laws, and there is an express power given to Congress "to revise and control them;" and this enumeration of that power strongly implies, that no other power over this subject is intended to be given.

It would be wise, in the opinion of many, that all promissory notes should be negotiable to facilitate commerce; and undoubtedly the whole law on the subject of inland bills of exchange is intimately connected with commerce; the buying and selling of slaves in one State, to be transported into another, is a portion of the commerce between States. Laws, then, may be made by Congress to control all these subjects. It may deserve much consideration, whether such a broad construction is not in the face of the Constitution, and especially of the tenth article of the amendments, which is in these words: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

It is said, however, that appropriations have been made, and roads laid out by Congress; and the Cumberland road and others are mentioned. Congress may undoubtedly make roads through the lands of the United States, not within the jurisdiction of any State, and the Cumberland road was established probably as a post road. Be that as it may, precedents of such doubtful character, and of such modern date, will not weigh much. The Constitution is not to be expounded by a single decision of the Legislature. It would scarcely be admitted by a majority of the Senate, that the Sedition law, as it is termed, was authorized by the Constitution, though it received the sanction of the judicial tribunals, as well as the Legislature; nor is it clear that the act to repeal the Judiciary law in 1803, would now be viewed as it was when passed.

It is further asserted that these roads and canals are to be constructed, and the expenditure made, with the assent of the States, and thus the power of Congress, if doubtful, is confirmed, and the bill in question is drawn with this aspect. Mr. D. said, on this point he would ask one question: Can money be appropriated by Congress for an object over which it is not authorized to legislate, because the States assent? Or, in other words, can a law be made, with the consent of the States, which is not warranted by the Constitution? By the Constitution, the judicial power extends to all cases arising under the Constitution, &c. Can Congress, with the assent of the States, extend the judicial power to murders, felonies, and other offences committed in the States? Where would be found a judge rash enough to execute such a law? It is believed that the true doctrine is, that the Constitution is the shield of every individual in the nation, and that its powers can neither be enlarged nor diminished by the States, except by amendments made in pursuance of its provisions.

It may be added, that neither of the Presidents, Washington or Adams, ever proposed a measure of this character. The present Chief Magistrate has suggested it in one or more of his Messages, but always with doubts as to the propriety of an interference, without amendments to the Constitution. President Jefferson, in his communication to Congress in 1806, after exhibiting the condition of the Treasury, and thereby showing the large surpluses of revenue, proceeds to inquire whether the import duties should be continued, and thereby the overplusses be accumulated; and, if so, how they should be disposed of; and, on this subject, makes the following observations:

"On a few articles of more general and necessary use, the suppression, in due season, will doubtless be right; but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid are foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford themselves the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other object of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the Constitutional enumeration of Federal powers. By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear; their interests will be identified, and their union cemented by new and indissoluble ties. Education is here placed among the articles of public care; not that it is proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal, but a public institution can alone supply those sciences, which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle; all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country, and some of them to its preservation. The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because, if approved by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the Federal trusts, and the laws shall be passed, and other arrangements made for their execution, the necessary funds will be on hand, and without employment. I suppose an amendment to the Constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution, and to which it permits the public moneys to be applied."

If, however, there were no objections arising from a want of Constitutional authority, Mr. D. said, that, in his judgment, the project was inexpedient.

No details are provided. What is to be the amount of interest in these various projects? Are co-partnerships with States or with individuals to be formed, and the profits divided? Or are boards of works to be established in all the States, with all the machinery of management incident to them, to be superintended by Congress? On all these points, and many others which might be suggested, the bill is silent; and the only answer we hear from the friends of the bill, to our inquiries, is, no details can be agreed on; should details be attempted, the bill would not be carried. Is this a sufficient answer? Before we proceed to grant away more than twelve millions of dollars, it is reasonable that the manner of expenditure should be pointed out.

The time also is not proper. A war has just terminated, leaving upon us a debt (with that which existed before) of one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. Our navigating and manufacturing interests are languishing, and no small portion of distress pervades many parts of our country. It is not, then, the prosperous moment to enter upon gigantic projects—it is not the time to expend millions on undefined objects.

It would be unwise, at any time, to pledge this great amount, and pledge it beyond the control of Government in any exigency of affairs. We are now at peace—we may soon be at war. Yesterday a proposition to reduce the army was rejected; and a strong reason urged was, that our relations with a nation bordering on our territory were in a disturbed condition. We all have a painful recollection of the state of our pecuniary resources during the years 1813, '14, and '15. We have now a full Treasury, and we speak of it as inexhaustible. Young men, coming to the possession of ample fortunes, deem their riches endless; they plan, build, improve, project, and boast, that "to-morrow will be as this day, and more also." The issue of such schemes we have witnessed. No private or public treasure is inexhaustible, without frugal and discreet management. Are we sure of the continuance of our resources? That derived from the land tax we can no longer look to; the other internal taxes will surely follow that on the land. A disposition is manifest to rid the nation of these vexatious taxes, and they will soon die, without a struggle or a groan. Our revenue from imposts is liable, at all times, to be seriously affected or cut off by a war. In such an event, will the people acquiesce in supporting burdens to construct roads and canals? The appropriation can be made by the next Congress; no part of the $1,500,000 will be received before its next session, and not more than one dividend. A change in the aspect of our affairs may occasion regret for this measure.

Many of the States have already expended large sums for the objects contemplated by this bill. The public is sufficiently accommodated. It is inequitable to burden such States with taxes, for a system of internal improvements, not needed by themselves, because other States have neglected these objects.

The measure is inexpedient, because, upon the principles assumed in the bill, the United States may be defeated in the accomplishment of the proposed objects, by a refusal of the assent of the States. If this Government had not the power of controlling absolutely roads and canals, leave them with the competent authorities. If it has the power, it should be examined in a manner becoming the supreme authority, and not by bargains with States.

There is also not a little reason to apprehend, that this project will produce much discord. On the subject of roads and canals, much sensibility is entertained by the citizens of the several States. Each section of a State will have its favorite plan. The State Legislatures and Congress will be besieged with applications and remonstrances, and a wide door opened to intrigue.

In view of all these considerations, is it not a dictate of wisdom to pause before we adopt a measure so important, so doubtful in its expediency, so questionable as to its constitutionality?

Mr. HARDIN said: As the motion to postpone the bill until the 4th of March had not been made on account of any special reason, he could not see why the Senate should not now act on the subject; and as it would, if it prevailed, defeat the bill, it involved the merits of the subject, and to that he should turn his attention.

I was in hopes, said Mr. H., that this bill had been so framed as to render the discussion of the Constitutional question—how far Congress had a right to make roads and canals—unnecessary; but, since it has been urged in debate, I flatter myself that I shall be able to show that there is nothing in this bill, nor in the measures it contemplates, which will violate the Constitution.

From the general organization of our institutions, we are naturally led to look to the General Government for support and protection as to those matters which relate to our national rights; and to the States for those which relate to our individual or social rights. In questions which involve the rights of one State or its citizens, in conflict with the claims of another State, or the citizens thereof, it is the General Government which is to decide these matters. To this end has the Constitution given jurisdiction to the courts of the United States in controversies between different States, or the citizens of different States. We have a right, therefore, to contend, that from the general tenor of the Constitution, whenever there are rights which the State, as a State, cannot cherish or protect, without coming in collision with a sister State, the General Government has a right to interfere and to extend its aid.

In relation to the intercourse between different States, it may frequently happen that two States, interested in promoting it, cannot succeed, owing to the want of co-operation, or of the permission of an intervening State; for example, the State of Ohio and the western parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, have a deep interest in the navigation of the Ohio river and an intercourse with Louisville. It is known that the rapids of that river, at Louisville, present a great obstruction to the navigation; I have heard some men say, that they thought it the interest of Louisville and its vicinity, that these obstructions never should be removed; that they caused the stoppage of nearly every boat that passed, and thus rendered them tributary to the adjoining towns. This I know is not the sentiment of my countrymen generally, it is the opinion of a few only; but suppose this contracted policy was to pervade the States of Kentucky and Indiana, and they were to refuse their co-operation, aid, or assent, to improving this navigation, would you say, sir, that the nation is manacled; that it possesses no power to interfere and protect the rights of those who wish to navigate this stream? It is certain that the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, as such, could not. This power, the power to regulate and to promote intercourse between the States, ought to belong to the General Government.

But what are the grounds on which it is contended that Congress do not possess this power? The honorable member from Connecticut (Mr. DAGGETT) has contended, that because the Constitution has expressly given the power to establish post roads, they are, by a legal rule of construction, excluded from establishing other roads. This would be correct, if there were no other parts of the Constitution from which this power could be fairly deduced; if the subject of post roads was not one which particularly called for such a provision as is contained in the Constitution. If no provision were in the Constitution relative to the establishment of post roads, I should not doubt the power of Congress to establish post roads from State to State. But it might well be doubted whether they had the power to establish a post road between two little towns within the same State, and off from the main post routes, for the purposes of neighborhood, not State, convenience. Hence the necessity for this express power in the Constitution.

But let us resort to the Constitution, and see if it does not sanction the objects of this bill. It is not necessary for me to contend, that "to provide for the general welfare," is a substantive grant of power. Take the paragraph of the Constitution according to the most limited sense in which it is construed by any one, and omit intervening words, and it will read, "Congress have power to collect taxes, to provide for the general welfare." In other words, Congress have power to raise money when the public welfare shall require it, and to disburse it in providing for the public welfare.

If Congress possesses this power, the first question presenting itself is, will the public welfare be promoted by great roads which shall extend from Maine to Louisiana, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi? which shall by canals connect inland navigation from one end of our union to the other—promote intercourse between State and State, expedite the mail, and facilitate the transportation of troops and munitions of war from one place to another in the hour of peril? I shall not be answered in the negative by any honorable member. I will not dwell on this point—the good sense of every one who hears me will respond in the affirmative.

The public welfare will then be promoted by accomplishing the objects of the bill. In accomplishing those objects, will any State privileges, will any private rights be violated, is the next inquiry. It has been contended that the States have the right to make roads and canals, and, therefore, Congress do not possess the power. It is conceded that the States have this right—so have they the right to erect fortifications, to build ships of war. But Congress have the same right, and not only the right, but it is their duty to do it. Suppose, in a time of war, two neighboring posts separated by marshy ground; would not Congress possess the power to make a road between them to facilitate the marching of troops, and the transportation of the munitions of war? No man will deny this power. Whence is it derived? From the power to provide for the public defence, and to disburse money for the public welfare. Then Congress may make roads whenever these objects will be promoted, provided, in so doing, the rights of States or individuals are not violated. Who is to judge when and how these objects can best be accomplished? Surely the General Government. That this power might be so exercised, might be so abused, as to violate State rights, I admit. So may the power to erect fortifications. Were Congress wantonly to seize, for a fortification, ground consecrated by the laws of a State to the burial of the dead—were they to prostrate the capitol of a State, or demolish the country seat of a citizen under like pretences—when there was no necessity for so doing, when sites equally advantageous and not thus valuable were in their power—it would be an usurpation; an act of tyranny on State and individual rights.

It must, then, be in the manner of exercising the power, and not in the power itself, that State rights are to be violated. For I will ask honorable gentlemen to inform me what State rights can be violated if Congress were to erect, by contract with all the proprietors on whose soil it passed, a great highway through any State; say, for example, a road from this District through Virginia, to the mouth of the Kenawha? Have not the citizens a right to sell their lands? to grant a right of way over them? Could not any citizen, or combination of citizens, construct such a road without consulting the Legislature of Virginia? And shall we be told that the National Government cannot purchase this right for the American family? I ask what difference there is in constructing a road by contract with the proprietors over whose soil it passes, and building a fortification or a seventy-four within a State by contracts with the proprietors of the ground used for either purpose?

The bill on your table, sir, expressly provides for obtaining the assent of the State government where the money is to be disbursed. But we are asked by an honorable gentleman, whether the assent of the State government is to give us powers which we do not possess. Congress possesses the power to make post roads, and the power to make military roads or canals, in other words, roads or canals which shall directly aid in the defence of any post, frontier, or vulnerable point, without any pretence for the interference of the States on these points. And I trust I have shown that Congress possess the power to disburse the public money in constructing roads, canals, &c., between State and State, which shall promote the public welfare, provided in the manner of exercising this latter power they do not conflict with any State or private right. But if the State government give their sanction to the measure, there can be no confliction of powers or rights. Hence this provision in the bill, that there may be no confliction with, no jealousies on the part of the State authorities. Whenever there are doubts on Constitutional points, it is best to conciliate—it is best to quiet them by courtesy, if time and circumstances will permit.

It is said by an honorable member, that even if the canals contemplated were constructed, they would be but little used in time of peace; that our citizens would prefer going round on the ocean, the great highway of nature. Does the honorable gentleman imagine we are always to remain at peace? Does he so soon forget the perils and difficulties from which we have so recently been relieved? For, notwithstanding the pride and satisfaction which every American bosom must feel at the general events of the war, and its honorable conclusion, the tear of pity must drop at the many cases of individual misfortunes and suffering, which occurred during its progress. Who can tell how many families were brought to penury, or the thousands of dollars that was paid for transportation? Who can count the millions worth of property that was lost or destroyed for the want of a market, during the war? Would not a great part of this have been avoided, if our inland communication had been what it might be in a few years? I verily believe a million of dollars, judiciously expended on the works now contemplated, would have saved many millions during the war to our Treasury, and tens of millions to our citizens. Shall we never profit by experience? Shall we fold our arms as soon as the storm is over, and lo! in idleness? No. Let us recollect that peace is the time in which to prepare for war. Let us judiciously use our resources. Let us connect, by permanent roads or canals, those points which the experience of the late war, or our own reflections, teach us are most exposed, with our military depots, and with the heart of the country, whose population is to be their support in the time of need. Let us not again wait until an enemy is at our doors, before we begin seriously to prepare for him.

We have been asked, Mr. Chairman, to postpone this bill until the meeting of another Congress; and it has been suggested, that passing it at this time, would seem like a peace offering for the offence committed in passing the compensation bill.

We are, by nature, too prone to put off until tomorrow, what may be done to-day. We have had this subject before us the whole session, we have time enough to discuss it; why, then, not meet it?

Not having been a member of Congress until this session, I stand in need of no peace offering on the subject alluded to; and not having desired to remain in public life after this session, I may be permitted to speak of Congress in terms which otherwise might not be proper. When, during the last session, I was at home a citizen, observant of the course of policy pursued by this Congress, I saw them adopting measures to restore a national currency; to place our finances on a respectable footing; to protect our infant manufactures; to foster our navy; to construct fortifications; and other measures of a like character. I congratulated myself and my country in the general wisdom of its measures. After I saw the unfortunate law alluded to, and the notice taken of it by the people, I considered the sum as nothing in a political point of view, compared with what I feared would be its consequences. I apprehended, and repeatedly so declared, that the re-action of the public excitement on Congress, would have an unfavorable effect upon other measures. There had, prior to that time, been in the State in which I reside, and I believe in the nation at large, an honorable and a generous confidence in Congress. But this measure, to say the least of it, gave to those who were disposed to misrepresent and caricature the motives of members, too plausible a ground for their attacks. Distrust has been the consequence; and I apprehend that members in both Houses have become too timid, too little disposed to adopt important measures for fear they should offend again, although, in relation to them, public sentiment has not been expressed.

I had been accustomed, Mr. Chairman, to look to the Senate with a high degree of respect and veneration—and as that body which was to give stability to our national affairs in those times of temporary excitement, which every free Government must at times be subject to. When I had the honor of taking a seat here at the commencement of the session, and formed a personal acquaintance with its members, the opinion which I had formed of this body was by no means lessened.

I consider this bill as of the first importance to the nation, as the Government will thereby stand pledged to commence internal improvements. It will not then be in the power of any one branch of the Legislature to stop or embarrass the subject. It has passed the other House. A great portion of the present members of that body were members during the war, and felt the embarrassments of our situation. It is surely then not detracting from the merits of the next Congress, to say that I am unwilling to leave it to them. Many of them will be new members; and a great portion of them elected under a temporary excitement. They may, like some gentlemen here now, be disposed to put it off. They may be disposed not readily to adopt important measures which we, by a postponement, would show we were unwilling to meet. Let us then avail ourselves of this opportunity. Let us concur in the measure. If we do so, I am sure the next Congress will not be disposed to repeal it.

The national sentiment is in favor of internal improvements. It has been the time, the mode, the manner of commencing it, on which public sentiment has heretofore been divided, not whether it ought or ought not to be undertaken.

Let any part of the Union be assured, by the passage of this bill, that it will receive a just portion of its benefits, and there will no longer be any obstacles to our commencing, and in time perfecting this great undertaking. Although I am fully persuaded that public sentiment calls for these works, this bill is not of a kind to catch the popular feeling of the moment; a feeling which is to be wielded for electioneering purposes. Its operation, although certain, will be slow; years will pass away; its advocates may be forgotten in the walks of private life, before its visible effects can be pointed out. If any subjects have been proposed and advocated in Congress at this session as peace offerings to an offended people, I should say that the projects of repealing your taxes and for reducing your army are of this kind. I do not believe that there is any complaint about your taxes at present by the great body of the people. So long as they see that these taxes are faithfully collected and judiciously applied to the payment of our debts, and to objects of permanent usefulness, they will be contented. The people recollect that the public faith in relation to these taxes is pledged to those from whom we borrowed money in the period of danger; they will not call for their repeal if left to the fair exercise of their own good sense.

One remark more, Mr. Chairman. Whatever other gentlemen may think of it, the argument of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LACOCK,) that this measure would cement the bonds of our Union, deserves consideration; I deem it of great importance. It is unfortunately the case that there have been in different sections of this Union jealousies and suspicions, in relation to other parts of it. I wish to God those jealousies could be sunk in the ocean of oblivion. By making your roads and canals, we shall have more intercourse with each other, and shall become better acquainted with each other; and I am persuaded that the better we become acquainted the more we shall like each other; the less willing we shall be ever to see a national barrier rise up between us and sever the bonds of our Union.

If, sir, this bill should pass at the present session, if any exertion of mine shall be calculated to aid its passage, I shall think that I have spent my Winter to some other purpose than that of receiving a portion of the public funds and forming a more extended acquaintance; I shall feel that I have rendered some service to my country in return; and I shall always recollect it with pleasure and with pride.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said, that he did not come to the Senate this morning with an intention to take any part in the debate on this great question. He now thought it his duty to make a few observations, however desultory they might be. He appealed to every member present, if the bill was not a new plan of legislating in this country? He did this with perfect confidence, because he was satisfied that nothing like it could be found in our statute book. It makes an appropriation of millions for roads and canals, without directing a cent to be expended on any road or canal. It was as incorrect as it was new, and against the invariable practice of the Government, which had been to make appropriations of money as specific as possible; to appropriate a certain sum for a certain object, which sum ought to be confined to such object. Who can tell what effect this general appropriation may have in a few years? When he recollected the importance of the election of President of the United States, and the struggles, anxieties, and exertions which had taken place about it, he feared that it might hereafter be connected with that great event. He spoke of human nature as it was; he believed the people and the Government as pure as heretofore. But he well remembered the feelings which were excited on a particular occasion, in the Capitol before it was burnt; and he as well remembered that at the sessions of Congress preceding the Presidential election, that which may be called the caucus session, motions have more than once been made to move the Seat of the General Government. He only meant to state the facts, and leave each member to draw his own conclusions.

The bill looked more like constitution-making than legislating. It established an important principle, and left the detail to be hereafter provided, though in one respect it differed widely from that, which is this: it locks up millions uselessly, for years to come, in the Treasury, which ought to be employed in the payment of the public debt. In time of peace no exertion ought to be spared to discharge it. Money in war is strength. Pay the debt, and the nation will be strong indeed. But apply the public money to expensive projects, and we may hereafter be as much embarrassed with debt and taxes as the British nation, unless our unsettled lands, to which people will move and better their situation, save us for a long time from their unfortunate condition. It is a safe and good rule to pay debts when you have the means.

It appeared more like the decrees and proclamations of France and Great Britain, which perplexed us so much during their late wars, than an act of Congress. But these some officer was directed to carry into effect, and, of course, to arrange the necessary detail. But the bill was not to operate, except by keeping the money in the Treasury, without the consent of Congress and a State Legislature, to be hereafter given.

Was it not like a constitution, which only ordains what may be done, but not how or when? Was it not incorrect, because there was no estimate of the cost? And no one pretended to guess at the sum necessary to finish the roads and canals, nor does any one know where they are to be. Was it not against the common practice of Congress to appropriate money without an estimate? It was certainly a new discovery in American legislation, being a permanent appropriation, not to be used until other acts were passed, a part of which the General Government could not pass. Very improperly, he conceived, the passing it now had been compared to the conduct of a prudent individual; such a one would count the cost before he undertook great and expensive works, and would pay his debts, if he had any, before he would lay his money up, not to be used for years to come. It is true that we have a permanent appropriation to pay the interest and principal of the debt; but that was not locked up, but in constant use, performing the purpose for which it was appropriated. We also have another, for eight years, for the navy—that, too, was employed.

Without entering into the question of the Constitutional power of Congress to make roads and canals, which power he was perfectly satisfied was not given to the General Government, he was convinced that if the argument of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) was true, that a bank was Constitutional because two laws had been passed to incorporate the two United States Banks, and that the courts had so decided, it was equally true, as stated by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DAGGETT) that the alien and sedition laws were also Constitutional, because the courts had so decided. There can be no difference, except that two acts have been passed in one case, and but one in each of the others. As to the courts, they stand on exactly the same footing; and the courts have exercised the power to declare a law unconstitutional, and rightfully, he verily believed.

The authority to pass the bill, judging from the arguments used, seems to be derived rather from precedents than the Constitution. This surely cannot be the true way to construe that sacred instrument. All who are called to act upon it must judge for themselves, and act accordingly. Hence all act on their own responsibility. If precedents are to be the rule of construction, the Constitution may be altered without applying to the States; and, according to it, no amendment can be made without their consent. This bill, if passed, will itself add to the precedents, and hereafter strengthen them.

He asked, why appropriate the money now, when the Secretary of the Treasury, in the same report in which he states the great revenue of the present year, calculates a considerable reduction for several years to come? Which calculations if correct, or nearly so, may render this appropriation very convenient.

No one doubts that roads and canals are desirable, and, when wisely undertaken and properly finished, profitable. But does this prove that it is now wise, when the United States are in debt, to make this appropriation for them, before the money can be used, and that too, to say the least, on doubtful authority? Every free people seem naturally to turn their attention and industry to improvements of every kind. As soon as they are prepared, they begin. The proper time is known, by their willingness, by the industrious and careful people being ready to vest their money in them, for a reasonable profit. He repeated the question, why pass the bill at this time, when we have been told that it may be repealed whenever Congress think proper?

Mr. M. said, there were one or two points more, which he was desirous to have noticed, but, his voice failing, he declined.

Mr. ASHMUN said, it was not his intention to discuss at large the question, whether Congress had the Constitutional power to pass the bill on the table. Were he to undertake this, he could do no more than to repeat the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DAGGETT,) and by repeating, he feared he should weaken them. He would, however, take the liberty of saying, that his present impressions were decidedly against the right of Congress to adopt the proposed measure. Heretofore it had been understood that it was almost universally admitted, that the authority alluded to did not exist, unless in consequence of the assent of the Legislature of the State, within which the road or canal was to be made. No precedent, it was believed, could be adduced, for going beyond this; and the bill itself, now under the consideration of the Senate, did not, in terms, propose to expend any portion of the immense fund, about to be set apart, in any of the States without their consent. The second section provides that the fund shall "be applied 'in constructing such roads or canals, &c., in each State, as Congress, with the assent of such State, shall by law direct.'" The bill, therefore, in terms, admits the right of a State to an agency in the expenditure of this money, and the friends of the bill seem to consider this as a most satisfactory answer to all the Constitutional objections which have been urged against it. The money, say gentlemen, is to be expended with the assent of the State; and how, they ask, can State rights or State sovereignty be violated under such circumstances? Mr. A. said, he was bound to believe, that when honorable gentlemen talked of the assent of a State, they meant a real voluntary assent, and not one that was nominal and forced. But an assent of the former kind was not provided for in the bill. The money was to be laid out on such objects in each State, as Congress, with the assent of the State, might direct. But suppose that Congress and the State government cannot agree upon the objects, what is to become of the money? Will the State receive any part of this great fund? No provision of that kind is made, and none is intended. On the contrary, it is conceded, that in such a case, the money is to remain in the Treasury of the United States, and as their property. The consent of the State, therefore, provided for in the bill is a mere shadow—an illusion. Congress may and will say, to a State, that the money shall be applied in constructing a road or canal in a particular place; otherwise it cannot be applied at all within the State. In such a case the State will be forced to yield its assent to the expenditure in the very place pointed out, however injudiciously or unwisely selected, or however injuriously the measure may affect its prosperity, under the heavy penalty of forfeiting all its interest in the fund. A consent obtained under such circumstances, is no consent; the disposition of the money will be as much without the fair agency of the State, and as exclusively within the control of Congress, as if the clause providing for the assent of the State was stricken out of the bill. The subject ought to be fairly treated. Congress ought either openly to assume the power of cutting roads and canals, wherever they please, whatever the States may say or think about it; a power never before assumed or contended for, and nowhere expressed in the Constitution; or else, they ought to provide for the exercise of a discretion and a volition on the part of the individual States, which shall not be the result of coercion, and which shall not be extorted by the consideration that withholding it will forfeit all claim to their just share of the fund. Mr. A. said, that it appeared to him, that gentlemen who held the opinion, which had heretofore so universally prevailed, and which had been sanctioned in a great variety of ways—that Congress had not the power to construct roads and canals through a State without obtaining its consent, must, upon reflection, be entirely satisfied, that such consent is not provided for in this bill in a manner to satisfy any reasonable man. The States which had not a preponderating influence in the Government ought not, and he thought would not, be satisfied with this nominal saving of their rights. If they should be, it would in his view lessen the importance of the subject; because in that case he should not think it of much consequence what rights were retained, and what were surrendered. Mr. A. concluded by saying, that as he did not consider the answers given to the Constitutional difficulties which had been urged, as satisfactory; and as he was also decidedly against the bill on various other grounds, most of which had been distinctly stated, he should vote for the indefinite postponement.

The question on postponement was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Brown, Campbell, Chace, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Howell, Hunter, Macon, Smith, Thompson, Tichenor, Troup, Varnum, and Williams.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 27.

Mr. WILSON, from the joint committee appointed to examine and report what business is pending between the two Houses, and what is indispensable to act upon previous to the adjournment, made a report; which was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of Hannah Allen, widow of Justice Allen, who died while in the service of the United States, praying relief, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the 7th instaut, the Message from the President of the United States, reported a bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to the State of Georgia, under the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and that State; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Francis Henderson and family, heirs and representatives of John Laurens, deceased, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

On motion, by Mr. STOKES, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Brown, Campbell, Daggett, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thompson, Tichenor, Troup, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Dana, Gaillard, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Smith, Varnum, and Wilson.

Mr. ROBERTS submitted the following resolution; which was read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of this House to Robert Tweedy, Tobias Simpson, and George Hicks, the sum of one hundred dollars each, for extra services.

Mr. CHACE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked and obtained leave to report a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments,'" reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1817," also reported it without amendment.

Mr. LACOCK, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for opening and cutting out a road therein described," reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. VARNUM, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill authorizing a subscription for the printing of the tenth volume of the public documents; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, relative to the land claims of Florida; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FROMENTIN also presented another memorial of the Legislature of the same State, respecting the land titles in the former Territory of Orleans; and the memorial was read, and referred to the same committee, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. FROMENTIN also presented the petition of P. and B. Jourdan, of the State of Louisiana, praying compensation for property destroyed by order of General Jackson, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FROMENTIN also presented the petition of widow Des Londi, of the city of New Orleans, praying compensation for damages sustained by the destruction of her property, whilst occupied by order of General Jackson, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee last mentioned, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the State of Georgia fifteen per centum upon the quota of direct tax, for the year 1816, assumed and paid by that State;" a bill entitled "An act authorizing the deposit of the papers of foreign vessels with the Consul of their respective nations;" a bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage;" a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Lawrence and others, merchants, residing in the city of New York;" a bill entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the public debt;" a bill entitled "An act to repeal so much of any acts now in force as authorizes a loan of money, or an issue of Treasury notes;" also, a bill entitled "An act respecting the assessment and collection of the direct tax;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill last mentioned; and, on motion, they were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes," and concurred therein.

The seven bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill authorizing a subscription for the printing of the tenth volume of the public documents, was read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817," and the bill having been further amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John de Castanado;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Caleb Nicholls;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Oliver;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph J. Green;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James H. Boisgervais;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Caze and John Richard;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Caslard;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jumonville de Villiers;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Kindall;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Orr;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Barthelemy Duverger;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Buckmaster;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Antoine Bienvenue, of the State of Louisiana;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander Holmes and Benjamin Hough;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Chism;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Villere;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Madame Montreuil;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peyton Short;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Williams;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Wells;" a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Asa Wells;" also, a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act directing the disposition of money paid into courts of the United States,'" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," reported the same without amendment; and, on motion, the Senate resumed the consideration of the said amendments to the bill last mentioned, and concurred therein.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Daniel Simonds, of Beverly, in Massachusetts, who belonged to the army of the Revolution, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

PETITION OF WILLIAM B. STOKES.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Stokes, made the following report:

That the petitioner was the owner of a house in the town of Havre-de-Grace, in the State of Maryland, when the British detachment arrived at that place in May, 1813, at which time it was destroyed by them.

The petitioner represents his said house as of the value of $7,500. The evidence laid before the committee appears to have been taken under commissions issued by Richard Bland Lee. It is set forth in the deposition of John C. Ridgely, a lieutenant of dragoons at said time in the service of the United States, that, on the Saturday before the British arrived at Havre-de-Grace, he reached there with a detachment of dragoons, in pursuit of deserters, and asked for quarters. Mrs. Scars, who kept the house of Mr. Stokes as a tavern, objected; but he insisted, and did quarter there from Saturday until Monday, when the British landed, and at that time had two deserters under guard in the said house. Subsequently he bore a flag to the enemy, and remonstrated against the destruction of said house, and was answered it was a military depot. Abraham Garret, another witness examined, swears that he accompanied the flag, and, on remonstrating against the conduct of the British in burning the town, he was told by the Admiral that many of the houses burnt were occupied for military purposes; that it was his determination to burn every house occupied for military purposes, &c.

SENATE.

The depositions of Ridgely and Garret are those only that go to touch the cause of the burning, and all they state amounts to no more than that this was the vague excuse of a vindictive freebooter for a disgraceful outrage on the usages of civilized warfare. The detachment of cavalry, it appears very evidently, so-journed in a public house over the Sabbath only; that they were there as persons passing casually, not in a military station, nor exercising any control over the house. The attempt to establish a military occupancy from the presence of militia is still more objectionable, as there were, it is believed, only the local militia present, and many of them residents. That a British Admiral, committing acts of the most flagitious desolation, should, when earnestly expostulated with against it, offer some pretence of justification at the expense of candor and truth, was to be expected—it was perfectly in character. But the committee think it would be erroneous to admit such authority to establish the fact of public occupancy. Mr. Garret says that many of the houses were alleged by the enemy to be occupied for military purposes. This would seem to convey the idea that Mrs. Sears's house was the strongest case, and that others are considered as eligible to allowance, even on slighter pretences. Some, however, it is admitted, have been burnt wantonly.

The whole transaction, the committee have no doubt, was of the most lawless character, and they cannot admit for a moment that this flagitiously incendiary act should be at all palliated by the admission of such evidence to sanction it as an act of excusable warfare.

The committee believe this to be the first claim of a similar nature presented for the decision of Congress, and they apprehend that the extent in which like claims may be made gives to the decision that may now be had an importance that does not belong to the value claimed. While they regret an enemy, styling themselves Christians, could commit acts of such aggravated turpitude, and that their fellow-citizens have been made the victims of such heinous depravity, they cannot feel the obligation on the Government to make indemnity, nor discover any practical principle of justice that would allow it. They submit, respectfully, the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvements, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States share of its dividends." The bill is as follows:

A Bill to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvements, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States share of its dividends.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the bonus secured to the United States by the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the dividends which shall arise from their shares in its capital stock, during the present term of twenty years, for which the proprietors thereof have been incorporated, be, and the same are hereby, set apart and pledged as a fund for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for their common defence.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the moneys constituting the said fund shall, from time to time, be applied in constructing such roads or canals, or in improving the navigation of such water courses, or both, in each State, as Congress, with the assent of such State, shall by law direct, and in the manner most conducive to the general welfare; and the proportion of the said moneys to be expended on the objects aforesaid, in each State, shall be in the ratio of its representation, at the time of such expenditure, in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said fund be put under the care of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being; and that it shall be his duty, unless otherwise directed, to vest the said dividend, if not specifically appropriated by Congress, in the stock of the United States; which stock shall accrue to, and is hereby constituted a part of, the said fund.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said Secretary, unless otherwise directed, to vest the bonus for the charter of said bank, as it may fall due, in the stock of the United States; and also to lay before Congress, at their usual session, the condition of said fund.

On motion, by Mr. ASHMUN, to amend the bill by adding to the second section the following proviso:

"Provided, however, That no part of said fund shall be expended on any of the objects aforesaid, within the State, without the assent of the Legislature thereof: And provided, also, That if any State shall refuse its assent as aforesaid, there shall be paid to such State such proportion of said moneys as would be expended therein on the objects aforesaid, if such State had assented to said expenditure."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Condit, Daggett, Dana, and Tichenor.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Campbell, Chase, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hanson, Hardin, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lacombe, Macon, Mason of New Hampshire, Mason of Virginia, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Varnum, Wells, Williams, and Wilson.

The bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT resumed the Chair, and it was reported to the House accordingly.

On motion, by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, to amend the bill by striking out of section three, after the word "duty," in line three, to the end of the section, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"To apportion and divide the said fund, as it annually accrues, among the several States now existing, and such as may hereafter be admitted into the Union, according to the then existing ratio of representation, as before directed; and to invest the same, so apportioned and divided, in funded debt of the United States, in the names of the respective States; and the funded

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Wells," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the third reading of the bill was objected to by Mr. ROBERTS, as being against the rule. And, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, it was agreed to suspend the twelfth rule for conducting business in the Senate, to the end of the present session. And the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Buckmaster," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Abraham Owen," and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment having been concurred in, on the question "Shall the amendment be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The said amendment having been reported by the Committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Caleb Nicholls," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the State of Georgia fifteen per cent. upon the quota of direct tax for the year 1816, assumed and paid by that State," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to fix the peace establishment of the marine corps," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to repeal so much of any acts now in force as authorizes a loan of money or an issue of Treasury notes," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered that it pass to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act relating to settlers on lands of the United States,'" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

VETO MESSAGE.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of unincorporated associations within the said District," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Anthony Buck," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The bill which had passed both Houses of Congress at the present session, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements," and presented to the President of the United States for his approbation, has been returned by the President of the United States with the following objections:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Having considered the bill this day presented to me, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements," and which sets apart and pledges certain funds "for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defence;" I am constrained, by the insuperable difficulty I feel in reconciling the bill with the Constitution of the United States, to return it with that objection to the House of Representatives, in which it originated.

The legislative powers vested in Congress are specified and enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution; and it does not appear that the power proposed to be exercised by the bill is among the enumerated powers; or that it falls, by any just interpretation, within the power to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution those or other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States," cannot include a power to construct roads and canals, and to improve the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce, without a latitude of construction departing from the ordinary import of the terms, strengthened by the known inconveniences which doubtless led to the grant of this remedial power to Congress.

To refer the power in question to the clause "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," would be contrary to the established and consistent rules of interpretation; as rendering the special and careful enumeration of powers, which follow the clause, nugatory and improper. Such a view of the Constitution would have the effect of giving to Congress a general power of legislation, instead of the defined and limited one hitherto understood to belong to them; the terms "common defence and general welfare," embracing every object and act within the purview of a legislative trust. It would have the effect of subjecting both the Constitution and laws of the several States, in all cases not specially exempted, to be superseded by laws of Congress; it being expressly declared "that the Constitution of the United States, and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Such a view of the Constitution, finally, would have the effect of excluding the judicial authority of the United States from its participation in guarding the boundary between the Legislative powers of the General and the State Governments; inasmuch as questions relating to the general welfare, being questions of policy and expediency, are unsuceptible of judicial cognizance and decision.

A restriction of the power "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money, would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of Government; money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution.

If a general power to construct roads and canals, and to improve the navigation of water-courses, with the train of powers incident thereto, be not possessed by Congress, the assent of the States in the mode provided in the bill cannot confer the power. The only cases in which the consent and cession of particular States can extend the power of Congress, are those specified and provided for in the Constitution.

I am not unaware of the great importance of roads and canals, and the improved navigation of water-courses; and that a power in the National Legislature to provide for them might be exercised with signal advantage to the general prosperity. But seeing that such a power is not expressly given by the Constitution; and believing that it cannot be deduced from any part of it without an inadmissible latitude of construction, and a reliance on insufficient precedents; believing, also, that the permanent success of the Constitution depends on the definite partition of powers between the General and the State Governments, and that no adequate landmarks would be left by the constructive extension of the powers of Congress, as proposed in this bill, I have no option but to withhold my signature from it; and cherishing the hope that its beneficial objects may be attained by a resort for the necessary powers, to the same wisdom and virtue in the nation which established the Constitution in its actual form and providently marked out, in the instrument itself a safe and practicable mode of improving it, as experience might suggest.

JAMES MADISON:

MARCH 3, 1817.

And the House of Representatives, in which House the bill originated, have taken the question as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and have resolved, that the said bill do not pass.

CLOSING BUSINESS,

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Anthony Buck," was read three several times by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of the unchartered associations within the said District," and concurred therein.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act respecting the compensation of the collectors therein mentioned," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Lee," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to the State of Georgia, under the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and that State," and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on the question, "Shall the amendment be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The said amendments having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

On motion by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH,

Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the Honorable JOHN GAILLARD, for the able and satisfactory manner in which he has discharged the duties of the President pro tempore of the Senate since his appointment to that office, and that this testimonial of their approbation and respect be entered upon their Journal.

Whereupon, Mr. GAILLARD addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The approbation of a body so respectable and distinguished as that which I have now the honor to address, is received with the most profound respect, and will ever be to me a source of pleasing and of grateful recollection. To the habits of order, of decorum, and attention to business, which so strongly mark the character of this honorable body, I have felt myself to be greatly indebted; but more, much more so, to that spirit of liberality and indulgence which has been extended to me on all occasions, and which has been ever ready to overlook my many deficiencies and errors, and to overrate my feeble, humble efforts, which have been directed with anxious solicitude to a faithful and impartial discharge of the duties of the Chair. If, in the course of my official conduct, it should have been my misfortune to have wounded the feelings of any honorable members, or in aught to have offended, I can assure them that such offence was unintentional on my part; and I pray them to accept this apology as an atonement. Permit me now, gentlemen, to tender to you collectively, as well as individually, my grateful acknowledgements for your kindness, and my warmest wishes for your prosperity and happiness.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force the second section of the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage,'" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause repayment to be made of certain alien duties," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings and improving the public squares."

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendment to the bill last mentioned, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and receded therefrom.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act respecting the district court of the United States, in the northern district of New York, and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties therein mentioned," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts due the United States," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Creek Indians," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Villere," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jumonville de Villers," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Summers and John Allen," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Asa Wells," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Antoine Bienvenue, of the State of Louisiana," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the negative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Barthelemy Duverger," and on motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the fourth day of March instant.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the third day of March, 1815, and for other purposes," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill last mentioned, and concurred therein.

On motion by Mr. KING,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be collected, digested, printed, and laid before the Senate at the next session of Congress, so much of the treaties, laws, and regulations of the different foreign countries, with which the United States have commercial intercourse, as relates to import, export, tonnage, light-house, pilotage, and port duties; to bounties and drawbacks; to colonial trade and navigation; to the national character of mariners; and to the ships' papers and navigation of such foreign countries respectively; specifying the comparative footing of national and foreign ships employed in any branch of such commercial intercourse.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Burnside," and no amendment having been made thereto, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James H. Boisgervais," and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Caslard," and the bill having been amended, it was reported to the House accordingly; and the amendment having been concurred in, on the question, "Shall the amendment be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The said amendment having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Orr," and no amendment having been made thereto, the bill was reported to the House; and, on the question, "Shall this bill be read a third time?" it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peyton Short," and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Nathaniel Seavey and others," reported it without amendment; and it was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment having been made thereto, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph J. Green," and no amendment having been made thereto, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Special Session.

Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Caze and John Richard," and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and on the question, "Shall this bill be read a third time?" it was determined in the negative. So it was resolved that this bill do not pass.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing payment of a sum of money to Teakle Savage, and others," reported it without amendment; and the bill was considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander Holmes and Benjamin Hough," and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The said amendments having been reported by the committee, correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of James Miller, of Louisiana, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for giving further time to complete the surveys and obtain patents for lands located under Virginia resolution warrants," in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read the first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee, reported said bill without amendment, and, on motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the 4th day of March, instant.

On motion by Mr. MORROW,

Ordered, That the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom were referred the following memorials and petitions, viz: The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, respecting the land titles in the former territory of Orleans; the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, relative to the land claims of Florida; the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying the extinguishment of British claims to lands in said Territory; the petition of Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit; the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying the settlers on the lands of the United States may be permitted to continue thereon, until the same shall be sold; the petition of sundry inhabitants of the province of Texas, praying a grant of land; the petition of William Hargrave; the petition of G. W. Johnston and others; the petition of Jesse Bean; and the petition of Nathaniel Cutting, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, respectively.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the intended recess, and have appointed a committee on their part, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution last mentioned, and concurred therein, and Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. TAIT were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BARBOUR reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communication to make to the two Houses of Congress.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the legislative business before them, are about to adjourn.

Whereupon the President adjourned the Senate sine die.

PROCEEDINGS

OF A

SESSION SPECIALLY CALLED,

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1817.

To the Senators of theUnited States, respectively:

SIR: Objects interesting to the United States requiring that the Senate should be in session on the fourth of March next, to receive such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive, your attendance in the Senate Chamber in this city on that day is accordingly requested.

WASHINGTON, January 1, 1817.

JAMES MADISON.

In conformity with the summons from the President of the United States, above recited, the Senate assembled in their Chamber in the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

JEREMIAH MASON and DAVID L. MORRILL, from New Hampshire.

ELI P. ASHMUN and HARRISON GRAY OTIS, from Massachusetts.

WILLIAM HUNTER and JAMES BURRILL, jun., from Rhode Island.

DUDLEY CHACE and ISAAC TICHENOR, from Vermont.

DAVID DAGGETT and SAMUEL W. DANA, from Connecticut.

Special Session.

RUFUS KING and NATHAN SANFORD, from New York.

JAMES J. WILSON and MAHLON DICKERSON, from New Jersey.

ABNER LACOCK and JONATHAN ROBERTS, from Pennsylvania.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY and NICHOLAS VANDYKE, from Delaware.

ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH and ALEXANDER C. HANSON, from Maryland.

JAMES BARBOUR, from Virginia.

NATHANIEL MACON and MONTFORD STOKES, from North Carolina.

JOHN GAILLARD and WILLIAM SMITH, from South Carolina.

CHARLES TAIT and GEORGE M. TROUP, from Georgia.

ISHAM TALBOT, from Kentucky.

GEORGE W. CAMPBELL and JOHN WILLIAMS, from Tennessee.

JEREMIAH MORROW, and BENJAMIN RUGGLES, from Ohio.

ELEGIUS FROMENTIN, from Louisiana.

JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, from Indiana.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

DAVID L. MORRILL, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire; HARRISON GRAY ORIS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; MAHLON DICKERSON, appointed a Senator by the State of New Jersey; and JAMES BORRIL, jun., appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, respectively for the term of six years, commencing this day, produced their credentials, which were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to them, and they took their seats in the Senate.

The oath was also administered to Messrs. SMITH, STOKES, TROUP, VANDYKE, and WILLIAMS; their credentials having been read and filed during the last session.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate, having appeared, Mr. GAILLARD administered the oath of office to him, and he took the Chair; when he addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In entering the office of Vice President, I beg leave to offer a public acknowledgement of the honor conferred upon me by the people of the United States, by placing me next in their confidence to that illustrious citizen whose patriotism, virtues, and eminent public services, receive this day the highest reward that a free people can bestow.

I assume the duties assigned me in the Senate with the greatest diffidence, arising from a consciousness of my inexperience in the forms of deliberative assemblies; and when, at the same time, I reflect that this Chair has hitherto been adorned by men of the first distinction for experience, talents, and character, I am oppressed by the magnitude of the responsibility which now devolves upon me.

My heart assures me that I may promise upright intentions, zealous industry, and rigid impartiality. If ought beyond these shall merit approbation, it will be justly ascribed to the wisdom and magnanimity of the members of this dignified body; and upon that wisdom and magnanimity I entirely repose myself for guidance and support.

The President of the United States, the Ex-President, and the Judges of the Supreme Court, having previously entered the Senate Chamber, on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate adjourned for one hour.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, being attended by the Ex President of the United States, the Vice President, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the Senators, and the marshals of the day, then proceeded to the elevated portico, temporarily erected for the occasion, where, after a short pause, he arose and addressed the audience as follows:

I should be destitute of feeling if I was not deeply affected by the strong proof which my fellow-citizens have given me of their confidence, in calling me to the high office whose functions I am about to assume. As the expression of their good opinion of my conduct in the public service, I derive from it a gratification, which those who are conscious of having done all they could to merit it, can alone feel. My sensibility is increased by a just estimate of the importance of the trust, and of the nature and extent of its duties; with the proper discharge of which the highest interests of a great and free people are intimately connected. Conscious of my own deficiency, I cannot enter on these duties without great anxiety for the result. From a just responsibility I will never shrink; calculating with confidence, that in my best efforts to promote the public welfare, my motives will always be duly appreciated, and my conduct be viewed with that candor and indulgence which I have experienced in other stations.

In commencing the duties of the Chief Executive office, it has been the practice of the distinguished men who have gone before me, to explain the principles which would govern them in their respective administrations. In following their venerated example, my attention is naturally drawn to the great causes which have contributed, in a principal degree, to produce the present happy condition of the United States. They will best explain the nature of our duties, and shed much light on the policy which ought to be pursued in future.

From the commencement of our Revolution to the present day, almost forty years have elapsed, and from the establishment of this Constitution, twenty-eight. Through this whole term, the Government has been, what may emphatically be called self-government; and what has been the effect? To whatever object we turn our attention, whether it relates to our foreign or domestic concerns, we find abundant cause to felicitate ourselves in the excellence of our institutions. During a period fraught with difficulties, and marked by very extraordinary events, the United States have flourished beyond example. Their citizens, individually, have been happy, and the nation prosperous.

Under this Constitution, our commerce has been wisely regulated with foreign nations, and between the States; new States have been admitted into our Union; our territory has been enlarged, by fair and honorable treaty, and with great advantage to the original States; the States, respectively, protected by the National Government, under a mild, parental system, against foreign dangers, and enjoying within their separate spheres, by a wise partition of power, a just proportion of the sovereignty, have improved their police, extended their settlements, and attained a strength and maturity, which are the best proofs of wholesome laws well administered. And if we look to the condition of individuals, what a proud spectacle does it exhibit! On whom has oppression fallen in any quarter of our Union? Who has been deprived of any right of person or property? Who restrained from offering his vows, in the mode which he prefers, to the divine Author of his being? It is well known, that all these blessings have been enjoyed in their fullest extent; and I add, with peculiar satisfaction, that there has been no example of a capital punishment being inflicted on any one for the crime of high treason.

Some, who might admit the competency of our Government to these beneficent duties, might doubt it in trials which put to the test its strength and efficiency, as a member of the great community of nations. Here, too, experience has afforded us the most satisfactory proof in its favor. Just as this Constitution was put into action, several of the principal States of Europe had become much agitated, and some of them seriously convulsed. Destructive wars ensued, which have, of late only, been terminated. In the course of these conflicts, the United States received great injury from several of the parties. It was their interest to stand aloof from the contest; to demand justice from the party committing the injury; and to cultivate, by a fair and honorable conduct, the friendship of all. War became, at length, inevitable, and the result has shown, that our Government is equal to that, the greatest of trials, under the most unfavorable circumstances. Of the virtue of the people, and of the heroic exploits of the Army, the Navy, and the Militia, I need not speak.

Such, then, is the happy Government under which we live; a Government adequate to every purpose for which the social compact is formed; a Government elective in all its branches, under which every citizen may, by his merit, obtain the highest trust recognised by the Constitution; which contains within it no cause of discord; none to put at variance one portion of the community with another; a Government which protects every citizen in the full enjoyment of his rights, and is able to protect the nation against injustice from foreign Powers.

Other considerations of the highest importance admonish us to cherish our Union, and to cling to the Government which supports it. Fortunate as we are, in our political institutions, we have not been less so in other circumstances, on which our prosperity and happiness essentially depend. Situated within the temperate zone, and extending through many degrees of latitude along the Atlantic, the United States enjoy all the varieties of climate, and every production incident to that portion of the globe. Penetrating, internally, to the great Lakes, and beyond the sources of the great rivers which communicate through our whole interior, no country was ever happier with respect to its domain. Blessed, too, with a fertile soil, our produce has always been very abundant, leaving, even in years the least favorable, a surplus for the wants of our fellow-men in other countries. Such is our peculiar felicity, that there is not a part of our Union that is not particularly interested in preserving it. The great agricultural interest of the nation prospers under its protection. Local interests are not less fostered by it. Our fellow-citizens of the North, engaged in navigation, find great encouragement in being made the favored carriers of the vast productions of the other portions of the United States, while the inhabitants of these are amply recompensed, in their turn, by the nursery for seamen and naval force, thus formed and reared up for the support of our common rights. Our manufactures find a generous encouragement by the policy which patronizes domestic industry; and the surplus of our produce, a steady and profitable market by local wants, in less favored parts, at home.

Such, then, being the highly favored condition of our country, it is the interest of every citizen to maintain it. What are the dangers which menace us? If any exist, they ought to be ascertained and guarded against.

In explaining my sentiments on this subject, it may be asked, What raised us to the present happy state? How did we accomplish the Revolution? How remedy the defects of the first instrument of our Union, by infusing into the National Government sufficient power for national purposes, without impairing the just rights of the States, or affecting those of individuals? How sustain, and pass with glory through the late war? The Government has been in the hands of the people. To the people, therefore, and to the faithful and able depositaries of their trust, is the credit due. Had the people of the United States been educated in different principles; had they been less intelligent, less independent, or less virtuous, can it be believed that we should have maintained the same steady and consistent career, or been blessed with the same success? While, then, the constituent body retains its present sound and healthful state, everything will be safe. They will choose competent and faithful representatives for every department. It is only when the people become ignorant and corrupt; when they degenerate into a populace, that they are incapable of exercising the sovereignty. Usurpation is then an easy attainment, and an usurper soon found. The people themselves become the willing instruments of their own debasement and ruin. Let us, then, look to the great cause, and endeavor to preserve it in full force. Let us, by all wise and Constitutional measures, promote intelligence among the people, as the best means of preserving our liberties.

Dangers from abroad are not less deserving of attention. Experiencing the fortune of other nations, the United States may be again involved in war, and it may in that event be the object of the adverse party to overset our Government—to break our Union, and demolish us as a nation. Our distance from Europe, and the just, moderate, and pacific policy of our Government, may form some security against these dangers, but they ought to be anticipated and guarded against. Many of our citizens are engaged in commerce and navigation, and all of them are, in a certain degree, dependent on their prosperous state. Many are engaged in the fisheries. These interests are exposed to invasion in the wars between other Powers, and we should disregard the faithful admonition of experience, if we did not expect it. We must support our rights or lose our character, and with it, perhaps, our liberties. A people who fail to do it, can scarcely be said to hold a place among independent nations. National honor is national property of the highest value. The sentiment in the mind of every citizen, is national strength. It ought, therefore, to be cherished.

Special Session.

To secure us against these dangers, our coast and inland frontiers should be fortified; our Army and Navy, regulated upon just principles as to the force of each, be kept in perfect order, and our militia be placed on the best practicable footing. To put our extensive coast in such a state of defence as to secure our cities and interior from invasion, will be attended with expense, but the work when finished will be permanent; and it is fair to presume that a single campaign of invasion, by a naval force superior to our own, aided by a few thousand land troops, would expose us to greater expense, without taking into the estimate the loss of property and distress of our citizens, than would be sufficient for this great work. Our land and naval forces should be moderate, but adequate to the necessary purposes. The former, to garrison and preserve our fortifications, and to meet the first invasions of a foreign foe; and, while constituting the elements of a greater force, to preserve the science, as well as all the necessary implements of war, in a state to be brought into activity in the event of war. The latter, retained within the limits proper in a state of peace, might aid in maintaining the neutrality of the United States with dignity in the wars of other Powers, and in saving the property of their citizens from spoliation. In time of war, with the enlargement of which the great naval resources of the country render it susceptible, and which should be duly fostered in time of peace, it would contribute essentially, both as an auxiliary of defence and as a powerful engine of annoyance, to diminish the calamities of war, and to bring the war to a speedy and honorable termination.

But it ought always to be held prominently in view, that the safety of these States, and of everything dear to a free people, must depend in an eminent degree on the militia. Invasions may be made too formidable to be resisted by any land and naval force which it would comport either with the principles of our Government or the circumstances of the United States to maintain. In such cases, recourse must be had to the great body of the people, and in a manner to produce the best effect. It is of the highest importance, therefore, that they be so organized and trained as to be prepared for any emergency. The arrangement should be such as to put at the command of the Government the ardent patriotism and youthful vigor of the country. If formed on equal and just principles, it cannot be oppressive. It is the crisis which makes the pressure—and not the laws, which provide a remedy for it. This arrangement should be formed too in time of peace, to be the better prepared for war. With such an organization, of such a people, the United States have nothing to dread from foreign invasion. At its approach, an overwhelming force of gallant men might always be put in motion.

Other interests of high importance will claim attention; among which the improvement of our country by roads and canals, proceeding always with a Constitutional sanction, holds a distinguished place. By thus facilitating the intercourse between the States, we shall add much to the convenience and comfort of our fellow-citizens; much to the ornament of the country; and, what is of greater importance, we shall shorten distances, and by making each part more accessible to and dependent on the other, we shall bind the Union more closely together. Nature has done so much for us by intersecting the country with so many great rivers, bays, and lakes, approaching from distant points so near to each other, that the inducement to complete the work seems to be peculiarly strong. A more interesting spectacle was perhaps never seen than is exhibited within the limits of the United States; a territory so vast and advantageously situated, containing objects so grand—so useful—so happily connected in all their parts!

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing, as we do, all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend, in the degree we have done, on supplies from other countries. While we are thus dependent, the sudden event of war, unsought and unexpected, cannot fail to plunge us into the most serious difficulties. It is important, too, that the capital which nourishes our manufactures should be domestic, as its influence in that case, instead of exhausting, as it may do in foreign hands, would be felt advantageously on agriculture and every other branch of industry. Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as, by extending the competition, it will enhance the price, and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

With the Indian tribes it is our duty to cultivate friendly relations, and to act with kindness and liberality in all our transactions. Equally proper is it to persevere in our efforts to extend to them the advantages of civilization.

The great amount of our revenue, and the flourishing state of the Treasury, are a full proof of the competency of the national resources for any emergency, as they are of the willingness of our fellow-citizens to bear the burdens which the public necessities require. The vast amount of vacant lands, the value of which daily augments, forms an additional resource of great extent and duration. These resources, besides accomplishing every other necessary purpose, put it completely in the power of the United States to discharge the national debt at an early period. Peace is the best time for improvement and preparation of every kind; it is in peace that our commerce flourishes most; that taxes are most easily paid, and that the revenue is most productive.

The Executive is charged officially, in the Departments under it, with the disbursement of the public money, and is responsible for the faithful application of it to the purposes for which it is raised. The Legislature is the watchful guardian over the public purse. It is its duty to see that the disbursement has been honestly made. To meet the requisite responsibility, every facility should be afforded to the Executive, to enable it to bring the public agents, intrusted with the public money, strictly and promptly to account. Nothing should be presumed against them; but if, with the requisite facilities, the public money is suffered to lie, long and uselessly, in their hands, they will not be the only defaulters, nor will the demoralizing effect be confined to them. It will evince a relaxation and want of tone in the Administration, which will be felt by the whole community. I shall do all I can to secure economy and fidelity in this important branch of the Administration, and I doubt not that the Legislature will perform its duty with equal zeal. A thorough examination should be regularly made, and I will promote it.

It is particularly gratifying to me, to enter on the discharge of these duties at a time when the United States are blessed with peace. It is a state most consistent with their prosperity and happiness. It will be my sincere desire to preserve it, so far as depends on the Executive, on just principles, with all nations—claiming nothing unreasonable of any, and rendering to each what is its due.

Equally gratifying is it to witness the increased harmony of opinion which pervades our Union. Discord does not belong to our system. Union is recommended, as well by the free and benign principles of our Government, extending its blessings to every individual, as by the other eminent advantages attending it. The American people have encountered together great dangers, and sustained severe trials with success. They constitute one great family, with a common interest. Experience has enlightened us on some questions of essential importance to the country. The progress has been slow, dictated by a just reflection, and a faithful regard to every interest connected with it. To promote this harmony, in accord with the principles of our Republican Government, and in a manner to give them the most complete effect, and to advance in all other respects the best interests of our Union, will be the object of my constant and zealous exertions.

Never did a Government commence under auspices so favorable, nor ever was success so complete. If we look to the history of other nations, ancient or modern, we find no example of a growth so rapid—so gigantic: of a people so prosperous and happy. In contemplating what we have still to perform, the heart of every citizen must expand with joy, when he reflects how near our Government has approached to perfection; that, in respect to it, we have no essential improvement to make; that the great object is, to preserve it in the essential principles and features which characterize it, and that that is to be done by preserving the virtue and enlightening the minds of the people; and, as a security against foreign dangers, to adopt such arrangements as are indispensable to the support of our independence, our rights and liberties. If we persevere in the career in which we have advanced so far, and in the path already traced, we cannot fail, under the favor of a gracious Providence, to attain the high destiny which seems to await us.

In the Administrations of the illustrious men who have preceded me in this high station, with some of whom I have been connected by the closest ties from early life, examples are presented which will always be found highly instructive and useful to their successors. From these I shall endeavor to derive all the advantages which they may afford. Of my immediate predecessor, under whom so important a portion of this great and successful experiment has been made, I shall be pardoned for expressing my earnest wishes that he may long enjoy, in his retirement, the affections of a grateful country—the best reward of exalted talents, and the most faithful and meritorious services. Relying on the aid to be derived from the other Departments of the Government, I enter on the trust to which I have been called by the suffrages of my fellow-citizens, with my fervent prayers to the Almighty, that He will be graciously pleased to continue to us that protection which He has already so conspicuously displayed in our favor.

After which, the oath of office was administered to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES by the Chief Justice.

The Senate having again assembled,

On motion, by Mr. KING,

Ordered, That the Committee of Arrangements wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that the Senate are ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

On motion, the Senate adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, March 5, 1817.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH reported from the committee that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he should this day, at an early hour, make a communication to the Senate.

After the consideration of Executive business,

Ordered, That Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. SANFORD be a committee to wait upon the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have any further communication to make to them, the Senate are ready to adjourn.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate adjourned to 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, March 6, 1817.

After the consideration of Executive business, the Vice President having absented himself for the purpose, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and

The honorable JOHN GAILLARD was elected.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the Vice President, elected the honorable JOHN GAILLARD President of the Senate pro tempore.

After the further consideration of Executive business, Mr. BARBOUR reported from the committee that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them he had no further communications to make to the Senate.

Whereupon, the President adjourned the Senate sine die.

14. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to an Uniform National Currency, be referred to a select committee.

15. Resolved, That the said select committees have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Smith, of Maryland, Mr. Grosvenor, Mr. King, Mr. Baker, Mr. Ward, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Darlington, were appointed a committee pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, Mr. Conner, Mr. Desha, Mr. Ward, of New Jersey, Mr. Peter, Mr. Thomas M. Nelson, and Mr. Dickens, were appointed a committee pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. Harrison, Mr. Tallmadge, Mr. Blount, Mr. Roane, Mr. Taul, Mr. Hungerford, and Mr. Marsh, were appointed a committee pursuant to the third resolution.

Mr. Pleasants, Mr. Betts, Mr. Culpeper, Mr. Lovett, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Stearns, and Mr. Clendennin, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fourth resolution.

Mr. Thomas, Mr. Griffin, Mr. Adgate, Mr. Baer, Mr. Woodward, Mr. McCoy, and Mr. Fletcher, were appointed a committee pursuant to the sixth resolution.

Mr. Pitkin, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Hopkinson, Mr. McKee, Mr. Hale, Mr. Crawford, and Mr. Clarke, of New York, were appointed a committee pursuant to the seventh resolution.

Mr. Wilde, Mr. Wright, Mr. Breckenridge, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Powell, Mr. Birdsall, and Mr. Heister, were appointed a committee pursuant to the eighth resolution.

Mr. Thomas Wilson, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Clayton, Mr. Bateman, Mr. Yancey, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Hawes, were appointed a committee pursuant to the ninth resolution.

Mr. Pickering, Mr. Comstock, Mr. Condict, Mr. Tucker, Mr. Taggart, Mr. Cilley, and Mr. Hooks, were appointed a committee pursuant to the eleventh resolution.

Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Bassett, Mr. William Wilson, Mr. Ruggles, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Bennett, and Mr. Tate, were appointed a committee pursuant to the twelfth resolution.

Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Webster, Mr. Hulbert, Mr. Whiteside, Mr. Hardin, Mr. Townsend, and Mr. Glasgow, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fourteenth resolution.

COMPENSATION LAW.

MR. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that he had, on all political occasions consulted his best judgment, and he had always voted with a view to promote the interest, and support the honor and rights of those who had, by their suffrages, given him a place upon the floor of Congress. That he had expressed the sentiments of his constituents, and his conduct had generally been approbated and sanctioned by them; that this coincidence of political views, and confidence in his wishes for their happiness and prosperity had left him at liberty to pursue his own course of conduct. That, notwithstanding this state of things, he had always believed in the right of instruction; and, at any time during his political course, he should have considered himself both honored and bound by the will of his constituents; the nature of the trust implied a duty, on the part of the Representative, that he will consult the happiness, and carry into effect, as far as he knows it, the will of those who elect him.

That, notwithstanding the discontent that had manifested itself in many parts of the United States, and in his own district, he was left to take that course which honor and duty dictated; and that, so far as he could infer the will of his constituents, it should have a controlling influence upon his mind; because the want of written instruction did not weaken the binding efficacy of the great fundamental principle to which he alluded. The want of a written impression may, by possibility, mislead the best among us; of course, that would give a high claim to indulgence. On this subject, he had no doubt he should meet the sanction and the approbation of those honorable and patriotic men, who, notwithstanding all his faults, had continued their confidence in him. Many considerations had entered into his mind in making a motion for a committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the compensation law. One object, was to gratify that portion of his constituents who were opposed to the measure. He said a portion of his constituents, because he well knew that many, very many, of his political friends, were in favor of the measure, both as to mode and amount; some were desirous that an experiment might be made, others disliked the mode, but do not object to the amount and many other minor differences; but he well knew that they would all either unite or acquiesce in a repeal of the statute; that the public mind might be tranquillized; that the great mass of inflammable matter which was afloat might be decomposed and rendered harmless; that hobby riders may be dismounted, and popularity-traps put flat on the surface; for he never intended, if he could make any other shift, to ride the one, or set the other. He claimed the indulgence of the House, to explain to them what he intended by his motion. He had heard of a variety of compensation bills, so called, and it was necessary to identify the one he intended to embrace by his motion. He did not intend a repeal of a compensation bill, which gave to members of Congress fifteen hundred dollars per session, whether extra or the great annual session, pointed out by the Federal Constitution, by which each member could draw as many fifteen hundred dollars as the sessions in which he served; no such bill can be found upon the Journals of the House. He did not intend a repeal of that compensation bill which allowed members of Congress fifteen hundred dollars per annum, whether present during the session, or absent, at home, or elsewhere, on their own business. Such compensation law cannot be found in the statute book. He did not intend a repeal of that compensation law which had given to the members of Congress six dollars a day until its passage, and then the fifteen hundred dollars. He had nothing to do with such a measure, as no such measure had been sanctioned by Congress. He did not intend a repeal of that compensation law which violated the Constitution, for he had never given a vote upon any such measure, although he well knew that a rejected amendment to the Constitution had been published as a part of that sacred instrument, to induce a belief that avarice had driven Congress from the path of duty. He had nothing to do with these and other compensation bills, so called, which existed only in the visions of fancy, the colorings of party, and the misrepresentations of faction; and these misrepresentations, with other causes, had combined in a manner so powerful and so forcible, to excite the jealousy of the people. Nothing less could have excited in such a degree their suspicion and displeasure against their Representatives, inducing them, in many cases, to withdraw confidence, under every concession, and refusing explanations from public servants who had never deviated before. He intended, by his motion, to repeal a compensation law, which gave to members of Congress a gross sum of fifteen hundred dollars for their services, provided they discharged, with fidelity, every day of every session, the duties of Representative, and not otherwise, whether one or more sessions during the Congressional year, in lieu of the six dollars per day; a compensation law which placed them on an equality with the Sergeant-at Arms, the Doorkeeper, the Assistant Doorkeeper, the Chief Clerk, and the Engrossing Clerk; and, on a footing, in a pecuniary point of view, of half as much as we give to the Clerk of the House; a compensation law, which was supported and voted for by a majority of both Houses of Congress, and signed by the President of the United States; a compensation law, which was acknowledged by every member of the Senate and of the House to be just, if not politic, by taking the fifteen hundred dollars; for he was informed that every member, one from Virginia excepted, had taken the money, which was conclusive evidence that they did not consider it public robbery. And the honorable gentleman from Virginia did not refuse the money because he thought it unjust, for he advocated the measure; upon principle only he could not agree to embrace the present Congress. The worth of that member was well known to the House; and as to those who had voted against the measure, and had received the compensation, he did not suppose that the people of any district would have complained of any such member, who had only taken that which had been allowed other members by law. In justice to himself, to the House, and particularly to the nation, he conceived it his duty thus to distinguish the real from the fictitious compensation laws; for the age of reason had not passed away, and although there may have been a temporary sacrifice of worth and merit, it cannot continue. Mr. J. said, such had been the artificial and unnatural excitement against the compensation bill, that a particular friend of his called upon his debtor to discharge a written obligation under bond and seal; upon presenting the note, the debtor demanded to know of his creditor, whether he was in favor of the compensation bill; and, upon being answered in the affirmative, payment was positively refused. This was not all. He had understood if a constable presented himself to the justices of the peace for preferment and promotion, he was called on to know if he was in favor of the compensation bill. If the justice of the peace wanted to be sheriff, he could think of no better expedient than to denounce the compensation bill; and particularly those who offered as candidates to represent counties in the State Legislatures, a denunciation of the compensation bill was made a sine qua non. In fact, by these and other means, the poor compensation bill excited more discontent than the alien or sedition laws, the quasi war with France, the internal taxes of 1798, the embargo, the late war with Great Britain, the Treaty of Ghent, or any one measure of the Government, from its existence. Such effects could not naturally result from the measure under consideration, but from the misrepresentation of designing men, and from a misunderstanding of it by the virtuous, the faithful, the honest, yeomanry of the country. Mr. J. said, this reminded him of another story that was told him, of a young gentleman having made known to the father of a beautiful daughter, his wish to visit the house on her account; who demanded of the young man, as a preliminary, whether he was in favor of the compensation bill! This brings me, said Mr. J., to the most natural part of the inquiry—the amount of compensation. If we consider this subject in an abstract or positive point of view, we must take a variety of circumstances into the calculation, and it may be difficult to say what is the precise sum that should be given. If a married man shall bring his family with him, he will incur an expense greater than to come alone. If a member should come alone to the City of Washington, he incurs less expense than if compelled to bring one servant, or an attendant, with him, to aid him on the road, and when at the city, to take from him the trouble of a thousand calls, which would break in upon his time, and render him, in a great measure, useless to his constituents; or by paying the same for extra attention at the boarding houses. Or the amount of expense may depend upon a thousand other considerations—whether a member shall drink water alone, or whiskey, or brandy, or Madeira, or Champaign; or whether a member shall occupy a room alone, or whether he can find some kindred spirit to occupy a room together. But this part of the subject cannot be reduced to anything like mathematical precision, as to the amount of compensation. But this I have said, and this I now repeat, that for married or single, with servants or without servants, with horses or without horses, fifteen hundred dollars, as a money-making scheme, is a poor business, whether applied to the farmer, the mechanic, the lawyer, the doctor, or any other other class of the community; such is the necessary expense and sacrifice in being a member. Nor is it my wish that it should be a money-making business. It is my wish to receive my compensation from the people whom I represent, and not from any other quarter. I despise prodigality, extravagance, and luxury, and equally despise griping avarice; and in this, as in all other cases of money, I would be governed by the principles of economy—fix no unnecessary burden on the people—but they must support their liberties and the Government of their choice, by a moderate and rational system of necessary supplies. But, leaving this positive view of the subject, comparatively speaking, the compensation to members of Congress is inadequate, and, to equalize, you must either level or reduce the salaries of most of the officers of Government, or you must add to the per diem which has been received by the members heretofore; and I believe the people have not yet instructed the members of Congress to lessen the salaries of officers which have been fixed by the patriots of the country for twenty years and upwards; and the people must love liberty less, and money more, than at present, to take such a step; and when I introduce the salaries of some of the officers of the Government, from memory, by way of comparison, it is not to alarm, or to imply that there should be a diminution or reduction, but to undeceive the people as to this monstrous law, which gives $1,500 to members of Congress.

Compensation Law.

The President of the United States receives a salary of $25,000 per annum, which amounts to $68 49 per day.

Vice President, $5,000 per annum, which, allowing the sessions to average four months, is $41 10 per day.

Secretary of State, $5,000, which is $13.70 per day.

Secretary of the Treasury, $5,000, which is $13.70 per day.

Secretary of War, $4,500, which is $12.32 per day.

Secretary of the Navy, $4,500, which is $12.32 per day.

Foreign Ministers, $9,000, which is $24.65 per day, besides an outfit of $9,000.

Chief Justice, $4,000, which, allowing the time occupied in travelling and attendance to be four months, or one hundred and twenty days in each year, is $33.33 per day.

Associate Judges, $3,500, which is, for one hundred and twenty days, $29.16 per day.

Postmaster General, $3,000 per annum.

Comptroller of the Treasury, $3,500 per annum.

Treasurer, 3,000 per annum.

Auditor of the Treasury, $3,000 per annum.

Register of the Treasury, $3,000 per annum.

Commissioner of the General Land Office, $3,000 per annum.

Commissioner of Internal Revenue, $3,000 per annum.

Superintendent General of Military Supplies, $3,000 per annum.

Attorney General, $3,000 per annum.

Accountants of the War and Navy Departments, each $2,000 per annum.

And about thirty clerks in the different offices, from $1,500 to $2,500 per annum.

In Virginia.—Judges of the Court of Appeals, $2,500 per annum, which, allowing four months, or one hundred and twenty days, for the whole time occupied in a year, is $20.83 per day.

Judges of the District Courts, $1,500 per annum, which, for three months, or ninety days, the extent of time occupied, is $16.66 per day.

In Pennsylvania.—The Judges of the Supreme Court receive $2,000 per annum, which, for one hundred and twenty days, the extent of the time occupied in a year, is $16.66 per day, besides travelling expenses.

The presidents of the courts of common pleas $1,600 per annum, which, allowing five months for the time occupied, is $10.66 per day, besides travelling expenses; and all the officers in Pennsylvania, from the constable upwards, have received an increase of compensation, within ten years, of at least fifty per cent.

But it is said the judges are commissioned, and of course it is implied that they are in service the whole year; but, by the same implication or legal intendment, a member of Congress is in service also the whole year. If, in fact, a member of Congress is in session as many days as a judge in the year, his actual service is as great. In vacation he is supposed to be employed, as it is his duty, in reading and study. The same remark will apply to a member of Congress, and if he is presumed to be as faithful as a judge, he will read as much, and study as much; and I would ask, if it should be less necessary for the Legislature to be enlightened, that controls every branch of the Government, than the Judiciary or the Executive Departments? But the duties of a judge disqualify him from being a lawyer, and he has no time to superintend his farm, or practice medicine, &c. In this respect the member of Congress must give up his practice at the bar; and in the case of the farmer or the doctor, the judge has greatly the advantage, because the service he performs only separates him from those avocations for short intervals. These disqualifications will not apply to State Legislatures, for there the term of service is at a period when the neighbors are healthy, the farmer only attending to his stock, the courts of justice closed, and the term of service so short, and the distance so inconsiderable, that the sacrifice cannot be compared to a six months' siege. I cannot speak as to other members, but, as to myself, I am as much engaged in the public service during the recess as I am at the City of Washington; the only difference is, that I am, a good part of my time, upon my own farm, and not at the expense incurred from it. This measure, which has excited so much discontent, involves feeling and not principle; and, with the advantage taken of it by the designing, the nature of the measure was well calculated to rouse the jealousy of the people, by our increasing our own compensation; but they should recollect that they have given us that power, and no other branch of the Government can take hold of it. The Constitution vests us with that power, and perhaps there is not a man in the United States of America who can suppose, for a moment, that the present compensation I allude to—the six dollars per day—can remain permanent as the laws of the Medes and Persians, while there is a gradual depreciation of money, and a proportionable increase of the cost of diet, of clothing, and all the necessities of life; and to give a memorable example of the forbearance of Congress to touch this subject, until driven to it by necessity, the compensation has been at six dollars per diem from the origin of the Government, upwards of twenty-six years ago, and in 1796 the sergeant-at-arms and the doorkeeper received six dollars per day, and their compensation was converted into a gross sum of $1,500 previous to the last session; and I presume we could not be charged with corruption or prodigality in this respect; at least we gave it to others, and received no more ourselves than we gave to the servants of the House; and when we did regulate our own pay, we only placed ourselves on an equality with the servants of servants; no disrespect meant to our faithful sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper. But I have always said, that my great object was reform in the proceedings of the House; the sum was not important in an individual point of view, although I have never thought I was undeserving of the $1,500, nor do my constituents believe it. But the mode makes us salary officers. Indeed! and what magic is there in the name of salary officers? The only difference between a salary officer and a per diem, is simply in the mode of payment, and not in the amount. It is immaterial whether you give the President his sixty-eight dollars per day, or whether he draws his $25,000 quarter-yearly. The same may be said of the Military, and the Executive, and the Judicial departments.

Compensation Law.

The per diem allowance originated from the necessity and convenience of members, who had daily calls upon them; and the salary officer was made such from a convenience in the payment quarter-yearly, or semi-annually. It is impossible to make any other distinction. I believe a gross sum will reform the proceedings of the House; and although the people may change their representatives every Congress, the case will not be altered; they will not, in the aggregate, find men more enlightened, more patriotic, more industrious, or less avaricious; and it is always best to blend self-interest and patriotism together, if it can be done; and the most beneficial results, in my humble opinion, were discovered from its operation at the last session. But I deny that members of Congress are made salary officers—at least they do not partake of the advantages of a salary officer. In the Executive, or Judiciary, or Military, or Naval departments, in case of sickness or absence on furlough, no deduction is made from the pay of the officer. If they languish on a bed of sickness, under their own roof, and surrounded by their own friends, the act of God does not lessen their claims upon their country for support; but if a member of Congress should be placed in the same situation, he receives no part of his fifteen hundred dollars; and, if detained after the session terminates, he receives no additional compensation. He must perform the service to entitle him to the money. The Roman diadem was put up to the highest bidder, and history gives us the consequences; and if making money or saving money be the object of the people, there is no district in the United States so poor, but could furnish some character to serve for nothing, and, if required, would give to the public Treasury the fifteen hundred dollars for a seat in Congress: but then we should have a very different Congress from that which is now so much identified with the honor and rights of the nation. The rich aristocracy of the country, who could roll in their carriages, or the profligate, who would wish to put themselves in the market, would generally compose a Congress under such an organization. We have a memorable, a very memorable example before us, of legislators serving their constituents for nothing—I mean the members of the British Parliament. And what is the effect? The King and Ministry have a fund to purchase a majority; some cannot be purchased—such as Chatham and Fox—others were not worth purchasing. But for fifty or one hundred years it has been so contrived, that the King and his Ministry have had a majority of Parliament, to support them in all their systems of war and taxes, with the exception of a very few years indeed, when the voice of the people for a moment gained the ascendancy. And although the members of Parliament serve for nothing, the votes, in many places, were bought as any other article in the market; for I was intimate with an Englishman who resided in my neighborhood, who informed me that he generally received sixteen pounds sterling for his vote at each election. The motion which I make, therefore, does not arise from any change of sentiment as to mode and amount of compensation. With other considerations, already mentioned, vox populi vox Dei has its controlling influence. Not that this principle implies perfection in the people, but I hold it as a political maxim that the people are the fountain of power and authority; and if they should be ever carried away by a momentary impulse, it does not arise from corruption; and the presumption is, that the people are always right, as they are, as a people, always virtuous in their views; and a Representative who acknowledges this principle, and is willing to carry into effect the will of the people, is entitled to some liberality—to some consideration. But I do not admit that the great body of the people are so deeply affected by this measure; but I believe there is sufficient floating inflammable matter to turn the scale in most instances. In this respect I am for taking away all pretext, and bow to the will of the people, thus partially expressed, under all those unnatural means of excitement to which I have alluded.

Vigilance is a virtue in a free people; it was this virtue that preserved us from Parliamentary encroachments in 1776, and conducted us to independence. Like Argus, the people should be watchful—they should not slumber upon their posts. But at the same time we should guard against precipitancy and unfounded suspicion, for these are the opposites of vigilance. It was these that threatened our cause in times that tried men's souls; when the Father of his Country, the immortal WASHINGTON, was distrusted of wanting the capacity of a General or Commander-in-Chief, in pursuing the Fabian policy, particularly his memorable retreat through the Jerseys, that saved his shattered army, and has crowned him with so much glory. Unlimited confidence is a weakness, but unfounded suspicion and distrust of a faithful public servant, is a political, if not a moral evil. In the United States, a public servant has some rational ground to make some calculation upon a long series of uniform and undeviating conduct, sentiment, and principle; without such a hope, honor and virtue, and faithful services, would fail to meet their reward, and it would revive the ostracism of Athens. There some apology may be urged, as the very organization of the government often subjected the people to the tyranny of usurpers, and put many men above the laws. It is otherwise in this land of liberty, where the laws and the constitution are supreme, and where a wise, virtuous, and experienced statesman may be of infinite service, so long as he pursues a correct course, and has the confidence of the nation; but where no man can act the tyrant without becoming impotent and contemptible, and where the finger of scorn and infamy point him out as harmless in the private walks of life. In this case, no man has been charged with having changed his politics; the Federal members are Federal still, and the Republican members are Republican still. It is to be regretted that it did not produce a change in that respect, and it had been for the better. I do not make use of party names to excite party feelings, nor do I intend to drop an expression that can wound the feelings of any, whether voting for the bill or against it. Odious as this measure was supposed to be, some were not satisfied with magnifying every feature into a Gorgon's head; but, what was the unkindest cut of all, it was represented that, while we were providing for ourselves, we had neglected to provide for the widow, the orphan, the wounded soldier, the discharge of the national debt, the volunteer who had lost his arms or his horse in the public service, and other claimants; that we had been loading the people with heavy taxes, when the session was taken up in reducing and repealing the taxes. Whatever may be the opinion of others, I will hazard the assertion that no Congress, since the peace of '83, has greater claims upon the confidence and affections of the people; and by their acts they shall be judged. Has the volunteer lost his only horse, this Congress has made provision to pay him; has the faithful soldier arrearages of pay due him, the last session made ample appropriations. Does the wounded, bleeding invalid present himself as indigent, and unable to procure his living by labor, he is placed upon the pension list; has the widow lost her husband, at the plains of Raisin or elsewhere, while in the service of the United States, the balm of consolation is administered to the bleeding heart in the five years' half-pay; and, if particular cases should be omitted, we are bound to pursue the example we have set ourselves; and if in any case we have made inadequate provision, the power is in our own hands.

Mr. JOHNSON then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the late act of Congress, changing the mode of compensation to the members of Congress; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DENIA intimated, that when this subject should be fully before the House, there would be more to be said about it; and, as the House had refused yesterday even to consider it, he required the yeas and nays on the question of consideration.

A sufficient number not rising to support the call for the yeas and nays, they were not called.

The question on consideration was determined in the affirmative, without a division; and the resolution itself was agreed to without a division; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. BASSETT, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. Cady, and Mr. REYNOLDS, were appointed the said committee.

THURSDAY, December 5.

Four other members, to wit: from Rhode Island, JOHN L. BOSS; from Vermont, LUTHER JEWETT; from Virginia, JAMES JOHNSON; and from Ohio, WILLIAM CREIGHTON, jun., appeared and took their seats.

Mr. WHITESIDE presented a petition of Mary Coles, who states that she has lost two husbands and one son in the military service of the United States, and that she is now poor and infirm; and praying to be supported at the public expense.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The SPEAKER presented sundry documents transmitted to him by Rufus Easton, in relation to the election and return of JOHN SCOTT, as the Delegate in this House from the Territory of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the decisions of Richard Bland Lee, Esq., Commissioner appointed under the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 9th of April, 1816.

Resolved further, That the said committee have leave to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed some surprise at a motion to inquire into the decisions of an officer invested with the powers and discretion of a judge, and which implied impropriety in the conduct of the officer. At least he conceived the motion to be rather hasty, and thought it would be better to decline its immediate consideration. He therefore moved that the resolution for the present be laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS assented to the wishes of Mr. WEBSTER, and the resolution was accordingly ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," so far as relates to the duty on tonnage.

The House went into the election of a Chaplain to Congress for the present session. On counting the ballots, it appeared that there were for the Rev. Burgess Allison 75, Walter Addison 40, and scattering 4.

Mr. ALLISON was consequently declared duly elected.

FRIDAY, December 6.

Three other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, ELIJAH H. MILLS; from Pennsylvania, JOHN ROSS; and from Delaware, THOMAS COOPER, appeared and took their seats.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the Kentucky Abolition Society, praying for an allotment of public lands for free persons of color.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented a petition of Rufus Easton, complaining of the undue election and return of JOHN SCOTT, as the Delegate in this House for the Territory of Missouri, and praying to be admitted to a seat in the place of the said JOHN SCOTT.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

Relief of Officers—Commissioner of Claims.

H. OF R.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The 9th section of the act passed at the last session of Congress "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," having received a construction giving it a scope of great and uncertain extent, I thought it proper that proceedings relative to claims under that part of the act should be suspended until Congress should have an opportunity of defining, more precisely, the cases contemplated by them. With that view I now recommend the subject to their consideration. They will have an opportunity, at the same time, of considering how far other provisions of the act may be rendered more clear and precise in their import.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 6, 1816.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, the Committee for the District of Columbia were instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the establishment of unchartered banking companies, or the circulation of the notes of such companies within the said District.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of organizing a corps of invalids, and of establishing additional military academies.

RELIEF OF DISTRESSED OFFICERS, &c.

Mr. HARRISON moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the relief of such of the officers and soldiers who having faithfully served in the armies of the United States, are now in distressed circumstances, and who, not having received wounds or disabilities whilst in actual service, are excluded from the benefits of the pension laws, and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HARRISON said it had been his intention to offer, with this resolution, some observations upon the matter to the House, but understanding that this course was not considered wholly proper on offering a motion to the House, he should reserve his remarks for another stage of the business. He did so with the less reluctance, since any remarks he should have made would have been with a view to enlist the feelings of the House, and he felt, on reflection, convinced they must be wholly unnecessary on this occasion, and that the heart of every American would beat in unison with the object he had in view. He had made the resolution as broad as possible, that it might afford to the committee a choice of the various modes of accomplishing the object committed to them.

The motion of Mr. H., as originally offered, embraced a positive instruction to the committee to report the mode in which the object could be best accomplished, but was so modified by Mr.

H. on the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, (of New York,) as above, to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of legislating on the subject. In support of this modification, Mr. TAYLOR remarked, that after the provision made at the last session, it was asking rather too much of Congress to pass a resolution, the terms of which assumed the fact that further provision was necessary. A change of opinion might have taken place in the House on the subject since the last session, but he thought it improper to take that for granted which yet remained to be ascertained.

The motion of Mr. HARRISON, as it stands above, was agreed to without a division.

COMMISSIONER OF CLAIMS.

Mr. FORSYTH offered for consideration the resolutions which follow:

1. Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to lay before this House the proceedings of the Commissioner appointed under the act of the last session, entitled "An Act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured or destroyed, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes."

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to order the further execution of the said act to be suspended, until the subject shall be disposed of by this House.

3. Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether the judgments made by the Commissioner under the said act have been paid by the Treasury, and if they have been paid, by what authority, and out of what fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, suggested, that they were a substitute for the motion he offered yesterday.

Which objection Mr. SPEAKER overruled; these resolves calling on the President for certain information, that of Mr. WILLIAMS embracing an inquiry, by a committee of Congress, into the proceedings of a public officer. They were on the same subject, it was true, but their objects were widely different.

Mr. FORSYTH said a few words as to the objects of his propositions. As to the first resolution, being almost a matter of course under any circumstances, he presumed no objection would be made to it. As to the second, the President had informed the House, by a special message, that the execution of a part of the act had been suspended; and had recommended the revision of other parts of it. It seemed, therefore, that the Executive thought the provisions of the act obscure or incorrect; and, Mr. F. thought, that, to avoid injury to the United States from further decisions under the act, it would be proper to suspend it. With regard to the last resolution, he had received information, he believed from a correct source, that the judgments of the Commissioner had been paid at the Treasury whenever presented; and, as far as he had understood, there had been no act of Congress making an appropriation for the purpose of liquidating these claims. The act constituting the Commissioner's office made no such appropriation; neither did the general appropriation act of the last session. At the close of the last session, an act had passed appropriating money for defraying the expenses of the Commissioner's office, but even that act made no appropriation for paying the judgments of the Commissioner.

H. OF R.

Commissioner of Claims.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, expressed his opinion that this object belonged to the Committee on Public Expenditures, rather than to the Committee of Claims, to whom the President's Message thereon had been referred. If the fact was as represented, that the public money had been paid from the Treasury without an appropriation, it would certainly fall within the province of that committee to inquire. As a member, however, of the Committee of Claims, he should submit to the judgment of the House in this respect; although, had he conceived the subject properly to belong to them, he should before now have introduced it to the notice of the House. The second resolution proposed by Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. Y. conceived to be wholly unnecessary; especially as he understood, from the President's Message, that the execution of that part of the act which was objectionable, had already been suspended, and would continue so until the House should act on the subject. If the President had suspended the operation of the act in one particular, he would in others, if he thought the public interest required it. Mr. Y. said, he saw no reason why the House should call upon the President to discharge a duty, which he had shown every disposition to perform without such interposition. Mr. Y. repeated, taking his seat, that this business appeared to him to belong properly to the Committee on Expenditures.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, said he fully agreed with the gentleman last up. The first and third resolutions he thought correct, but the second unnecessary, and was, therefore, opposed to it. No danger was to be apprehended to the public interest, from the execution of any other part of the act than that which had been suspended; whilst, on the other hand, great injury would result from a total suspension of the execution of the act to those individuals, who had claims before the Commissioner of a minor character, which did not come under the objectionable provision of the act. Was it at all necessary, Mr. D. asked, after the great trouble which the claimants of this character had taken to substantiate their claims, that their examination should be suspended, because a part of the act, not at all affecting them, was incorrect? He hoped not. He flattered himself that, on this view of the subject, the gentleman from Georgia would agree with him, and withdraw the second resolution.

The question having been taken on the first resolution, to which there was no opposition, the question on the second was propounded from the Chair.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, said, he hoped the honorable gentleman would not press this resolution. It was very questionable indeed, in his mind, whether the House could pass such a resolution. As to the language of the President in respect to the act, it amounted to no more than this; that, there being some doubt of the proper construction of the act, he had recommended to the Commissioner to forbear further decisions under a particular part of it, until Congress should have acted on it. He should not presume, he said, that the President had ordered a public officer to suspend his official duties; to do which he has no more power, said Mr. W., than I or any other member of the House or of the community. It was made by an act of Congress the business of the officer referred to, to perform certain specific duties required by that act; and the repeal of the act only could suspend his official functions, or take away the right given by the act to individuals in certain cases, the existence or justice of which was to be decided by a judge specially constituted for the purpose. If the question were as to the faithful execution of the law, the inquiry may be confided to a committee of the House; if whether the law be a wise one, it was for the House to decide, on examination, whether it required modification or repeal. It was a serious question, in point of right, whether the President could be requested by this House to enjoin a public officer not to execute the duties of his office, in the creation and appointment of which the other branch of Congress had a hand as well as this. All the purposes desired would be answered by the adoption of the first resolution, especially if that also was adopted (proposing an inquiry into the Commissioner's decisions,) which now lay on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH said he did not pretend to enter into the question of the power to suspend the execution of the law; nor was it necessary as to the law in question, the execution of a part of which had already been suspended by the President. If he had the power to suspend a part of the act, without the request of the House, he had the same right to suspend the whole with or without their request. Mr. F. hoped, therefore, the resolution would be adopted. The act itself, he said, was of a very peculiar nature; he had himself been opposed to its passage; but few gentlemen had coincided with him in opinion. He thought it ought not to have passed; and the execution of it had not made him more favorable to its provisions. The main objection to it was, that it gave to the Commissioner the final judgment on all claims submitted to him; that his judgment entitled the party, without appeal, to payment at the Treasury. It appeared, from the Message of the President, either that the act was defective, or that the Commissioner had extended his power beyond the proper limits. Mr. F. therefore wished the execution of the law suspended, because with regard not only to the part of the act referred to by the President, but to all the sections of the act, the same spirit may prevail. The wish of Mr. F. was, that the act should be reviewed, or at least that part of it which gives the Commissioner the entire control of the public funds, as far as concerns these claims. Vast injury might result to the United States, if he was suffered to go on. However incorrect his decisions, the money paid away is beyond our control, and these claimants receive money from the United States in defiance of our authority. With this view, Mr. F. said, he wished the act suspended, without reference to the manner in which the authority given by it had been exercised.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Commissioner of Claims.

H. OF R.

Mr. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, that if the House acted at all in the manner proposed by the second resolution, it must be jointly with the Senate. If the suspension of the law be requested, it is, for the time being, suspending the act; it is legislating on it anew. Mr. B. had no objection to the temporary suspension of the act, but wished to see it done in an unobjectionable form.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that as the member who had introduced this motion had candidly expressed to the House his opposition to the law (at the last session) to be confirmed now, there was no inconsistency in his wishing to suspend by resolution, now, an act which he could not at the last session suspend by his vote or arguments. In consequence of its embracing a large class of cases, some of a doubtful nature, the President had advised the Commissioner to suspend the execution of one section of the act; and the question was yet to try before this House, whether proper ground had been taken by the Commissioner, or not, in respect even to that section. But had the President opposed the decisions of the Commissioner under any other part of the act? If we go on the principle of may-be mischiefs, said Mr. J., the gentleman might as well lay before this House a resolution to suspend our own powers, or those of any other department or branch of the Government, lest injury might grow out of them. I ask the gentleman who introduced a resolution so much affecting my constituents, whether he would legislate on this principle? Mr. J. said he had himself superintended three hundred cases of claims, to come before this Commissioner, the aggregate amount of which was not fifteen thousand dollars—not a peppercorn to the claims from other parts of the United States. Why should the decision of such claims be arrested? It was a novel principle of legislation to suspend the execution of a law because it is possible mischief may arise, or because one was originally opposed to it. If the gentleman would put his finger on a case in which injury was likely to be done to the United States, Mr. J. said, he would take the gentleman's word for it, and bow with submission to his proposition to suspend the law. Until such a case was pointed out, he would not vote to recommend to the President his duty. Had he been wanting in it? As he had recommended the suspension of judgments under one part of the law, was it not presumable that he would have included others if necessary? The cases of horses lost, &c., came literally and unequivocally under the law; but he freely avowed his opinion that, in all cases it would cover, the law ought to have a liberal construction. If such had been given to it, he did not disapprove it; though there might possibly have been cases decided, in regard to which the evidence ought to have been sifted more nicely.

Mr. YANCEY moved that the resolution should lie on the table. He said he could not see the necessity of going out of the usual course of legislation to adopt it. If the gentleman knew of any pending decisions of an improper character, and requiring the suspension of the act, the question would present itself differently; but, for one, Mr. Y. said, he could not vote for this motion till he heard some evidence to that effect.

Mr. FORSYTH expressed his hope that the House would not conclude, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that because he (Mr. F.) had been opposed to the passage of the law, at the last session, he now wished to suspend it. It was the law of the land; and when it became so, his opposition to it ceased. My only object, said Mr. F., is to add to it such provisions as shall prevent the Commissioner, if he be desirous to do so, from mistaking the provisions of the act. My object is to limit and define it, that it cannot be misinterpreted. With respect to the facts which have come to my knowledge, I have no information of such a character as will authorize me to bring it before the House: if I knew the facts, I should have stated them in my place, and not called upon the President for them. The President had already stated to the House, Mr. F. observed, that he had reason to believe there had been, or would be, an erroneous construction of the law. The great difficulty was, that the control of a single commissioner was complete and final over the admission and amount of the claims. I wish, said Mr. F., that the Treasury of the United States should not be open to the decisions of the Commissioner; I wish to secure the Treasury from the result of error or corruption in the adjudication of these claims. So far as I am informed, the Commissioner has not made any corrupt decisions; but I believe he was about to have made very erroneous decisions. I wish, in short, that we may give to some department the power of revising all the acts of the Commissioner; that he shall not have full power to dispose of the public money.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was bound to infer that the course of conduct which the President pursued was such as he had authority to pursue; and he had no right to order the officer in question, or any other judicial officer, to suspend the execution of a law. The President had no doubt advised the officer to suspend his decisions on certain cases; but the proposition in the resolution is to do something more than advise, if it is to do anything at all. Mr. W. submitted to the House whether it ought to pass such a resolution? He did not say whether it would have any binding force on the officer—he did not think, however, he would disregard it; but, suppose the Senate should think differently from the House, and request the President to give a direction to the Commissioner to go on. It was a mistake to suppose that the President could suspend a law on the request of any one branch of the Legislature. Mr. W. said he never had been a friend to the law in question; he thought it an extraordinary power to give to an individual to sign away as large an amount as the whole land tax for a year, without a power being reserved to control his decisions. But the only remedy is to repeal or modify the law. He was, he said, altogether against making a nugatory interference by a resolution which nobody was bound to regard, nor, he believed, at liberty to regard.

The question was then taken on laying the second resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

The third resolution was taken up, and agreed to without a division.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then called up the resolution which he laid on the table yesterday, for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the decisions of Richard Bland Lee, Esq., Commissioner, &c.

The House having taken up the resolution, and the mover modified its phraseology—

Mr. W. said, that as neither of the resolutions just agreed to embraced the object he had in view, he must advocate the passage of this resolution. He considered the inquiry important to the country, to the constituents of the members on this floor, and to the judicial character of the gentleman whose official conduct was the subject of it. Mr. W. said he had heard many reports unfavorable to the decisions of that officer. If they were true, he had certainly acted in a manner different from what had been expected of him at the time he was appointed. If untrue, the inquiry was necessary to restore his official character to the confidence it ought to have. As it might conciliate the votes of gentlemen for his proposition, he would mention one or two instances of what appeared to him incorrect decisions, of which he had been informed by common report. When the British entered this city, he said, they destroyed a house of Mr. Carroll, and another of Mr. Ringgold. The owners of these houses, from what he had heard, were not entitled to reimbursement of their losses. But to Mr. Carroll had been adjudged $27,000, as the value of his house; and to Mr. Ringgold $17,000 for his. The decisions of the House had been uniformly against this class of cases; and, if the decisions of Mr. Lee were wrong, they called for the interference of this House. The inquiry could do no injury to Mr. Lee or to the country. With that gentleman, Mr. W. said, he had no acquaintance; but he was happy to state that his character was such as to forbid the idea of collusion with the claimants. He might have, nevertheless, decided incorrectly; and as the House could not rejudge his decisions once made, it was proper that they should be correct—into which it was his object to inquire. If he had decided correctly, it would be so reported by the committee; if not, the committee might recommend a repeal or modification of the law, or a removal of the officer, &c.

Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, suggested that the object of his colleague would fall within the duties of the Committee on Expenditures; but did not move an amendment.

No objection being made to the resolve, it was agreed to without a division, and a committee ordered to be appointed accordingly.

Messrs. WILLIAMS, CREIGHTON, McKEE, MILLS, JEWETT, SMITH of Virginia, and W. P. MACLAY, were appointed the committee.

ADMISSION OF INDIANA.

A resolution from the Senate, in form of a joint resolution, declaring the admission of the State of Indiana into the Union, was received, twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Some conversation took place on the propriety of taking it up to-day, which was advocated by Messrs. HARRISON and LOWNDES, who considered the resolve as a matter of form merely, and opposed by Messrs. HARDIN and TAYLOR, of New York, who regarded it in a different light, and argued that so solemn an act as pronouncing on the character and republican principles of a State constitution, ought to be more deliberately considered than was proposed. The motion for to-day did not prevail. After ordering the constitution of the new State to be printed, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, December 9.

Five other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM PIPER and JAMES M. WALLACE; from Maryland, STEVENSON ARCHER and CHAS. GOLDSBOROUGH; and from Virginia, DANIEL SHEFFEY, appeared and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. LATTIMORE, the petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, presented on the 27th December, 1815, praying for admission into the Union as a State, was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. LATTIMORE, ROBERTSON, DESHA, TUCKER, HARRISON, PITKIN, and TALLMADGE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. FORSYTH rose, and called the attention of the House to the reconsideration of a resolution [the third] adopted, on his motion, on Friday last; the object of which was, to inquire of the Executive by what authority the judgment of the Commissioner of Claims had been paid. He was, he said, altogether mistaken in supposing that the act establishing the office contained no appropriation for paying the claims, as, on subsequent examination of the act for another purpose, he had discovered. The mistake originated from a consultation of the marginal notes to the law, and to the several appropriation laws of the last session, from which he could not discover that an appropriation had been made. As the resolution had not been presented to the President, he hoped the House would indulge him in reconsidering it.

The House having agreed to reconsider the resolution, [the third,] it was withdrawn by Mr. F.

On motion of Mr. BROOKS, a committee was appointed to inquire what amendments are necessary, if any, in the act, entitled "An act granting bounties, in land and extra pay, to certain Canadian volunteers," passed March 5th, 1816, with leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. BROOKS, SMITH, of Maryland, ALEXANDER, ROSS, and BENNETT, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. PETER, the Military Committee was directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, one or more foundries for the manufactory of brass and iron ordnance; and what alteration it is expedient to make in the present system of supplying the Army with provisions.

Mr. WENDOVER, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States.

The House having agreed, by a bare majority, to consider this resolution—

Mr. WENDOVER said, as there appeared to be much opposition to the motion, he would not press it for the present; but suffer it to be laid on the table. He would only remark, that the flag was not now appropriate; that there was an incongruity in it, which appeared to him to require correction. The motion was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS M. NELSON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending so much of the act, entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war," as makes it necessary for the guardians of the children of deceased soldiers of the regular Army to relinquish the claims of such children to the bounty in land, which is due for the services of their parents.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of paying the militia expenses incurred by the several States, without the previous sanction or authority of the Government of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. WRIGHT, PLEASANTS, CHAPPELL, CREIGHTON, PARRIS, WEBSTER, and LAW, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making some provision for the widows of such soldiers as enlisted in the late war for the term of five years, or during the war.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the construction of a turnpike road from Winchester, in Virginia, to unite with the Great Western Turnpike at Carter's, at the foot of the Alleghany mountain.

VACCINATION.

Mr. CONDUCT presented the petition of Doctor James Smith, agent under the "Act to encourage vaccination," praying that provision may be made to enable him to supply the vaccine matter, free of any fees or charges, to the Surgeons in the Army and Navy, and to any person whatever who may apply to him for the same.—Referred to Messrs. CONDUCT, LITTLE, WENDOVER, BROWN, and WOODWARD, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of James Smith humbly represents: That your memorialist has been employed to preserve and distribute the vaccine matter, in conformity to the act of Congress, entitled "An act to encourage vaccination."

He begs leave to state, that he has kept it constantly active and fit for use, and that he has been daily distributing it to all who applied to him for it. The use of the kine pock has been thus greatly promoted in almost every section of the United States, and the propagation of the natural small pox has been, thereby, frequently checked in places where otherwise perhaps it would have become a severe scourge and fatal pestilence among the people.

But omitting, in this place, all further explanation of the convenience and fitness of this establishment, to encourage and diffuse the practice of vaccination over our widely extended country, your memorialist begs leave to add, that every day's experience has given new proofs of the essential advantages which the public have derived, and must continue to derive, from keeping an uninterrupted supply of this inestimable remedy, in some well known place, where due responsibility will attach to its faithful distribution.

To insure the accomplishment of this desirable object and to encourage, as far as practicable, the most liberal use of the vaccine matter, your memorialist prays that some suitable provision may be made by the National Legislature, to enable him to supply it, free of any fees or charges, to all surgeons employed in the Army and Navy of the United States; as well as also to furnish it, with plain directions for its use, free of all expense, to every other citizen who may apply to him for it. Respectfully, your memorialist,

JAMES SMITH.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 6th, 1816.

ADMISSION OF INDIANA.

The House, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, proceeded to the order of the day on the resolution recognising the republicanism and conformity to the Constitution and laws of the constitution of the new State of Indiana, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. DESHA in the Chair.

On motion of Mr. MILNOR, of Pennsylvania, the constitution was read through for the further information of the House; and its verification examined.

No debate took place on the resolution, which was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was accordingly read a third time, and passed, unanimously.

TUESDAY, December 10.

At the usual hour of meeting—

Mr. LOWNDES apprized the House, that in consequence of the death of an infant child of the SPEAKER, he would not be able to attend this day to open the House. Mr. L. therefore, moved that the House should adjourn until to-morrow.

Constitutional Amendment.

DECEMBER, 1816.

The Clerk of the House having put the question on this motion, it was carried, nem. con.

WEDNESDAY, December 11.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, ERASTUS ROOT; from South Carolina, HENRY MIDDLETON; appeared and took their seats.

The SPEAKER presented the petition of Rufus Easton, contesting the seat of JOHN SCOTT, as the delegate for the Territory of Missouri, and praying to be admitted to a seat in the place of said Scott.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting thereport of the commissioners appointed to mark and survey a road from Reynoldsburgh, on the Tennessee river, through the Chickasaw nation; which was read and referred to Messrs. REYNOLDS, SHARPE, CREIGHTON, GRIFFIN, and BAER.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Elections, made a report in part on the certificates of election, and other credentials, of several of the members, which was read and laid on the table.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, from a select committee, reported a bill for the relief of Nathaniel Williams; which was twice read and committed, and was subsequently ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled and superannuated officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States of the Revolutionary war and of the late war, and of militia disabled in the late war. [This bill contemplates the establishment of a corps of invalids.] The bill was twice read and committed.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of allowing to the State of Georgia fifteen per centum out of her quota of the direct tax of 1816, assumed by the State and paid at the Treasury of the United States within the time prescribed by law—the usual abatement not being allowed at the Treasury, in consequence of the omission of the Governor to give notice of the State's assumption within the time prescribed by the act of Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting the reports of the land commissioners for the eastern district of Louisiana, of the commissioners of the Missouri Territory, and of the recorder of the land titles in the same Territory, being eleven bound volumes.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a supplement to the law passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Joseph Stewart and others," for the purpose of authorizing the payment of the sum of money mentioned in the first section of the said act to the said Joseph Stewart, his attorney, or assignee, for the benefit of himself and his associates; and also for the purpose of correcting a misnomer in the third section of the said act.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William Mayrant, informing that he had transmitted to the Governor of South Carolina a resignation of his seat as one of the members of this House for that State.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by law for the final adjustment of land claims in the Missouri Territory, and of transferring the final settlement of those claims to the register and receiver of said Territory, together with some third person, to act as a Board of Commissioners for the same.

Mr. FORSYTH moved for the consideration of his motion for requesting the President to order the further execution of the claims' law to be suspended till Congress should have acted on it.

On the question to proceed to consider the same, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, of Virginia, moved a resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the widows and orphans of those militia who, after their return home to their place of residence, may have died of diseases contracted whilst in the service of the United States.

The necessity of this motion being questioned by Mr. CONDUCT, on the ground of the law of the last session embracing such cases—

It was supported by Messrs. HUGH NELSON, P. P. BARBON, and BURWELL, of Virginia, who stated that the law of the last session embraced the cases of those dying on the road home, but did not include the cases of those who reached their own doors before they fell a sacrifice to disease.

The motion was then agreed to, nem. con.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, rose to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; on which, having on former occasions expressed his views, he would now only remark, that only once had the question ever been really tried in this House, and that was at a moment of great public embarrassment, not favorable to a mature deliberation on its merits. This was the first fair occasion of presenting the subject fully for consideration. Several of the States had, since the first agitation of the question in the House, given to the proposition their sanction and recommendation, among which were Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Virginia; and it had, at one session, received the sanction of the Senate of the United States. If ever there was a period favorable to a proper amendment of the Constitution, it was the present moment, when we are literally at peace, at home and abroad. Mr. P. then introduced the following resolution :

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution.

For the purpose of choosing Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, each State shall be divided by its Legislature into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled.

Each district shall contain as nearly as may be equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

In each district, the qualified voters shall elect one Representative.

For the purpose of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall be divided by its Legislature into a number of districts equal to the number of Electors to which the State may be entitled. Each district shall contain, as nearly as may be, equal numbers ; which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives in the Congress of the United States shall choose one Elector. The Legislature of each State shall have power to regulate the manner of holding elections, and making returns of the Electors chosen. In case all the Electors shall not meet at the time and place appointed for giving their votes, a majority of the Electors met shall have power, and forthwith shall proceed, to supply the vacancy.

A division of the States into districts, for choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and into districts for choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, shall take place as soon as conveniently may be after each enumeration and apportionment of Representatives shall be made ; which districts shall remain unaltered until after the succeeding enumeration and apportionment of Representatives.

The resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, from the committee to whom that part of the President's Message was referred, made the following report :

The committee of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the subject of a National University, report to the House, as the result of their deliberations, a bill for the erection and endowment of such an institution.

The committee, pursuant to usual forms, might perhaps, without impropriety, regard this as a sufficient performance of their duty, and, after presenting the bill, without comment, have left it to find its appropriate place among others, and to receive or be denied consideration, according to the opinion entertained of its consequence and urgency.

But the number of communications relative to this subject, which, though they have received attention, seem to have escaped it, because they have not been definitely acted on, may possibly expose the House to a censure more serious than that of merely neglecting the successive recommendation of several Chief Magistrates—a censure as injurious as unjust, yet not unbecoming that body to prevent, by making, as soon as possible, some disposition of a question, that ought to be determined, on account of its frequent occurrence, even though it should not otherwise be thought particularly interesting.

No room will then be afforded for even supposing the National Legislature indifferent to an object, admitted by most persons to be desirable, and by many believed to be now both practicable and expedient ; justice will be done to the representatives of the people without detracting anything from Executive merit ; that confidence, which is the chief strength of our Government, will be preserved, and public opinion, enlightened by discussion, expressing itself at length decisively on the proposed measure, will either require its adoption, sanction its rejection, or acquiesce in its postponement, until the necessity becomes more obvious, or the difficulties that oppose it can be more easily removed.

Your committee, therefore, have ventured to suggest some of the reasons which recommend the present as a favorable time for investigating, and perhaps, also, for adopting the plan they have proposed.

Among these, the prosperous state of our finances, leaving a large unappropriated surplus, the probability of a long continued peace, the flourishing condition of our capital, and the facility with which a portion of the public property within it might now be advantageously disposed of, so as at once to increase the convenience of the city, and support the proposed institution, may fairly be enumerated.

Besides, the information heretofore collected has enabled the committee to report at an early period, and it is believed that the present session, though inevitably a short one, will not present so many objects of great difficulty or deep interest, as entirely to exclude others of a more tranquil and less obtrusive character, to which it is possibly a portion of time might be profitably devoted.

The acquisition of a scientific and literary reputation, not unworthy of their naval and military renown, can never be beneath the ambition of a people, since the most durable of all glory is that of exalted intellect.

The world is still a willing captive to the spells of ancient genius ; and the rivalry of modern empires will be perpetuated by their arts and their learning, the preservers of that fame which arms alone may indeed win, but can never keep.

Any measure which contributes, however remotely, to give American literature a rank and name among mankind, cannot, therefore, be regarded with indifference by our citizens ; and every effort towards that end must be witnessed at the present moment with unusual satisfaction, since it will present the interesting spectacle of a young nation, bending its whole strength to the pursuit of true greatness, and anxious to emulate all that is amiable in peace as well as all that is noble in war.

That the institution contemplated will have a happy influence on the harmony of our country and the unity

H. OF R.

New York Canals.

DECEMBER, 1816.

of our national character, has been often supposed, and your committee feel inclined to anticipate effects no less happy from its operation on the genius of our people.

If American invention, unassisted as it has been, already excites the astonishment of Europe, what may not be expected from it when aided and encouraged? And why should not aid and encouragement be yielded by institutions like the present, founded and endowed by the munificence of the State? In our own day we have seen them work wonders in physical science, even when directed by a stern, jealous, and exacting Government, which, while training the mind to be quick, dexterous and daring, darkened its vision, and circumscribed its flight. Is it here alone they would be impotent, where no depth could be hidden from its glance, no height forbidden to its wing?

But your committee, fearful of exhausting your patience, forbear to extend this report by arguments which it is easier to multiply than to withhold; for the same reason they refrain from answering objections which could not be stated without injury, since, in replying to them, force and perspicuity must be sacrificed to conciseness. Nor can such a course be required where it is intended merely to present a general result, not the particular process of reasoning by which that result has been obtained. Your committee, however, desire it to be understood, that they have not declined examining any objection which occurred to them, and though some have been found which it must be confessed are not without difficulty, all are thought capable of a satisfactory answer.

Under a conviction, therefore, that the means are ample, the end desirable, the object fairly within the legislative powers of Congress, and the time a favorable one, your committee recommend the establishment of a National University, and have directed their chairman to submit a bill and estimates for that purpose.

Estimates of the value of lots and squares belonging to the United States, as furnished by a communication from the Superintendent of the City.

Four thousand building lots of 5,265 square feet each, and about 2,000 feet front on the waters of the Potomac river, Eastern Branch, valued at - - - - -	$750,000
Squares 1 to 6, proposed to be laid off into building lots, containing, in the whole, 816,000 square feet, or 165 standard lots, valued at - - - - -	200,000

But the latter amount is the only one which it is supposed could be speedily realized.

Estimate of the expense of buildings for the National University, on a plan susceptible of extension, but calculated for the present to answer for one hundred and sixty persons.

Buildings (which it was supposed last year might be completed in the year 1818.)

1. Habitations for the principal and six professors, two buildings, 75 by 54 feet, $30,000 each - - - - -	$60,000
2. Lodgings for one hundred and sixty students, refectory, (temporarily in the basement story,) fuel and provision, cellars, servants' apartments, 265 feet by 46 - - - - -	75,000

3. Lecture rooms at the southwest angle, steward's apartment, &c., 75 feet square	45,000
4. Planting and enclosing - - - - -	20,000

A Bill for the establishment of a National University.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is, hereby authorized and required to cause to be surveyed, and laid off into building lots, such part as he shall think proper of the ground reserved of the United States, in the City of Washington, and to cause the same to be sold, at such times and places, and in such proportions, and under such regulations as he shall prescribe; and the proceeds thereof, after defraying the charges of survey and sale, to be invested in such stocks or public securities, as shall, by him, be deemed advisable, and the same, when so invested, and the dividends thereon arising, shall constitute a fund for the support of a National University.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be erected, on such site, within the District of Columbia, as he shall select, the buildings necessary for a National University; and for defraying the expenses thereof, the sum of — dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be prepared and laid before Congress, at its next session, a plan for the regulation and government of the said University.

The bill was twice read and committed.

NEW YORK CANALS.

Mr. Brooks presented the petition of the commissioners appointed by the State of New York to superintend and provide for the improvement of the internal navigation of that State, signed by De Witt Clinton, their President, praying for assistance, in land or money, from the General Government, to aid in opening a communication, by means of canals, between the navigable waters of Hudson's river and Lake Erie, and between the said waters of Hudson's river and Lake Champlain; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress:

The representation of commissioners of the State of New York, in behalf of the said State, respectfully sheweth: That the Legislature of the said State in April last passed an act to provide for the improvement of their internal navigation, (of which act we take the liberty of transmitting herewith a copy.) In this it will be seen that a board of commissioners is constituted, and that, among other duties enjoined upon them, they are required to make application to the Government of the United States for cessions, grants, or donations of lands or money, for the purpose of aiding in opening a communication, by means of canals, between the navigable waters of Hudson river and Lake Erie, and the said navigable waters and Lake Champlain. To fulfil this requisition, then, is the object of this address.

Next to the establishment and security of the right to self-government, we flatter ourselves that no subject requiring legislative interference can be found more interesting than the one which we are charged to lay before your honorable body; and we venture to solicit your favorable consideration of it, in full confidence that an enlightened public spirit may justly give to it such a measure of patronage as cannot fail to produce signal benefits to the nation.

The benefits to be acquired by the United States from the construction of these canals will most obviously and immediately affect their pecuniary and their political interests. More remotely, indeed, they will exert a favorable influence upon every object embraced within the scope of an enlightened and paternal policy. If we consider the extent and fertility of our territory northwest of the Ohio, the large proportion of it which yet remains unsold, the disposition and the ability which our eastern fellow-citizens possess to purchase and to improve it, we cannot be insensible of the great pecuniary advantage which would result from opening to them a safe, easy, and economical passage into that territory. Every dollar saved to them in the expenses of removing thither would operate to enhance the value of the public lands, and, at the same time, to hasten their settlement; and it is obvious that a canal from the Hudson to Lake Erie would save a large portion of these expenses. The number of persons to be affected by this consideration cannot be accurately stated. It certainly would not be small. We are well assured that, in the course of one year since the war, more than twelve thousand new settlers, almost exclusively from the East, have established themselves within the limits of this State, west of the Genesee river.

Whatever adds to the value of all that land produces must increase the value of the land itself. To a country which depends upon a distant market for the sale of its surplus productions, it is of great importance to afford every possible facility of transportation; for all that is taken from the expense of transportation is added to the value of the articles transported, and, by cheapening the rate of carriage, many articles are rendered valuable which would otherwise be worthless. Moreover, if habit or the necessary accommodation of life requires that such a country should consume foreign goods to the amount of all its surplus productions, it is evident that the landholder there enjoys a twofold benefit in every increased facility of transportation. Perhaps the whole of the country between the great lakes, the Mississippi, and the Ohio—certainly the greater part of it—would derive from the completion of our principal canal greater advantages for distant communication than any country so far inland has hitherto enjoyed, and incomparably greater than that country can ever derive from any other means. Regarded, then, merely as a measure of pecuniary wisdom, we trust your honorable body will make such an appropriation in favor of it as will insure its accomplishment.

But considerations of a political nature seem to us most urgently to recommend the construction of these canals. The great influence exercised over the Western Indians, even in our own territory, by the subjects of a foreign Government, we have always had numerous reasons to wish destroyed. This influence depends materially upon establishments erected for the promotion of the fur trade. Any measure that would open, between one of our seaports and the region where furs are collected, a road in all respects preferable to any other, besides drawing to our own citizens a profitable commerce, would tend eventually to the subversion of that influence, and, in the meantime, offer to us important facilities for controlling it.

The trade carried on between our country and the Canadian provinces is already considerable, and is rapidly growing. The fruits of the earth from the southern shores of Erie and Ontario, and from the borders of Champlain, find their way to the ports of our northern neighbors cheaper than they can to any which offers a market of our own, and are there exchanged for the various commodities of foreign countries. This trade is, indeed, profitable to many of our citizens who engage in it, but it is much more so to the British. Subject to their control, they direct it to the advancement of all their public interests; and it is no mean instrument of that advancement. It is evidently the vital spirit of their internal navigation, which it cannot fail to exalt into a consequence that may hereafter greatly affect us. Would not the prosecution of our projects to complete effect result immediately in giving to citizens of the United States the entire profits of this trade, and to Government all the security and influence connected with a thickly settled frontier, and a most decided superiority of shipping on the lakes?

Nothing can be more certain than that the continuance of our Union is essential to our freedom. The means of this continuance are to be found only in the strength of our common interests. Whatever extends and consolidates these interests, must be of distinguished importance to Government; and can anything be imagined more efficaciously conducive to these objects than opening to distant sections of our country the means of easy and profitable intercourse? Virtuous and enlightened men among us have long delighted themselves with looking forward to the period when a canal communication between the Hudson and Lake Erie would afford to half the United States more ample means of promoting every social interest than have heretofore, in any country, been furnished by the accomplishment of any human enterprise.

The advantages of canals were not entirely unknown to ancient Governments. Among them, the wisest and most powerful executed works of this kind in every direction through their territories, for the purpose of agriculture, commerce, and war. The vestiges of many of these are still discoverable; and they are doubtless to be reckoned among the most impressive memorials that remain of ancient greatness. When we recollect the instrumentality which canals have formerly exhibited in collecting the blessings of wealth, strength, and a crowded population for every country through which they passed, and see those very countries, by the neglect and ruin of them, reduced to their original barrenness, can we suppress a conviction of their immense utility? But it is not alone from history, and the faint traces of them which have survived the lapse of many centuries, that the advantages of these improvements are to be known. There are proofs more conclusive; our own times furnish them. In contemplating the present state of Europe, it is impossible not to be struck with the number and extent of her canals; and we perceive that they abound most in those countries where the wants of the social state and the means of power have been most diligently explored, and are most profoundly understood. We see them there enabling extensive empires to hold in speedy administration to every public object all the resources of their most remote sections, and, at the same time, increasing those resources prodigiously, by the economical exchanges of which they are the occasion. Experience is always a safe guide; it is especially to be trusted when it has been acquired in the midst of difficulties and dangers, and has been sanctioned by the wisdom of different nations. If, then, in the pressing exigencies of recent events, when every power of national defence and annoyance has been exerted, when all the capacities of men, as individuals, and in political combination, have been remarkably evolved, we observe in that quarter of the globe a perpetually growing attention to the subject of canals, is it not expedient, is it not wise, for us to engage in making them? No country is more susceptible of all their benefits than ours; none of larger extent presents fewer impediments to their construction. They constitute improvements peculiarly fit for a Republic. They contribute equally to the safety and opulence of the people, and the reputation and resources of the Government. They are equally desirable in reference to the employments of peace and the operations of war. In whatever light they are viewed, they seem to combine the substantial glories of the most splendid and permanent utility.

But if the execution of those of which we are the advocates be impracticable, or would involve an expense disproportionate to their value, they can have no claim upon the favor of the National Legislature. On these topics we entertain no doubts. The minute examination which has been made this season, under our superintendence, of all the lands which these canals will traverse, has convinced us that an expenditure not exceeding ten millions of dollars would be sufficient to perfect them. Shall they remain unattempted? The State of New York is not unaware of her interests, nor disinclined to prosecute them; but where those of the General Government are united with hers, and seem to be paramount, she deems it her duty to ask for their assistance. Wherefore, in her behalf, we solicit your honorable body to make such an appropriation, in lands or money, to aid in the construction of these canals, as you, in your wisdom, may think reasonable and just.

By order and in behalf of the said commissioners, at a meeting held in Albany on the 10th November, 1816.

DE WITT CLINTON, President.

An Act to provide for the improvement of the internal navigation of this State. Passed April 17, 1816.

1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, That Stephen Van Rensselaer, De Witt Clinton, Samuel Young, Joseph Ellicott, and Myron Holley, be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners to consider, devise, and adopt such measures as may or shall be requisite to facilitate and effect the communication, by means of canals and locks, between the navigable waters of Hudson river and Lake Erie, and the said navigable waters and Lake Champlain; and, in case of the resignation or death of any of the said commissioners, the vacancy thereby occasioned shall be supplied by the Legislature, in the manner in which Senators of the United States from this State are directed to be chosen.

2. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall choose one of their number to be president of their board, and shall appoint a fit person for their secretary, who shall be allowed and paid such salary as the said commissioners shall deem proper and reasonable; and the president of the said board of commissioners shall have power to call a meeting of the same whenever, in his opinion, the public interests require it; and the said board may adjourn, from time to time, to meet at any time and place they may deem most conducive to the public good; and further, the said commissioners shall have power to employ such and so many agents, engineers, surveyors, draughtsmen, and other persons, as in their opinion may be necessary to enable them to fulfil and discharge the duties imposed upon them by this act, and to allow and pay the said agents, engineers, surveyors, draughtsmen, and other persons, for their respective services, such sum or sums as may be adequate and reasonable.

3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said commissioners, as soon as may be after the passing of this act, to cause those parts of the territory of this State which may lie upon or contiguous to the probable courses and ranges of the said canals to be explored and examined, for the purpose of fixing and determining the most eligible and proper routes for the same, and to cause all necessary surveys and levels to be taken, and accurate maps, field-books, and draughts thereof to be made; and further, to adopt and recommend proper plans for the construction and formation of the said canals, and of the locks, dams, embankments, tunnels, and aqueducts which may be necessary for the completion of the same, and to cause all necessary plans, draughts, and models thereof to be executed under their direction.

4. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, or a majority of them, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to make application, in behalf of this State, to the Government of the United States, and of such States and Territories as may be benefited by the said canals, or either of them, to the proprietors of lands through or near which the said canals, or either of them, may or may be proposed to pass, to all bodies politic and corporate, public or private, and to all citizens or inhabitants of this or any other of the United States, for cessions, grants, or donations of land or money, for the purpose of aiding in the construction or completing of both or either of the said canals, according to the discretion of the several grantors or donors, and to take to the people of this State such grants and conveyances as may be proper and competent to vest a good and sufficient title in the said people to the lands so to be ceded or granted as aforesaid; and, for the purposes above mentioned, it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to open books of subscription in such and so many places as they may think necessary and expedient, and under such rules and regulations as they may from time to time establish; and further, it shall be their duty to ascertain whether, to any and to what amount, and upon what terms, loans of money may or can be procured, on the credit of this State, for the purposes aforesaid.

5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to make, or cause to be made, with as much accuracy and minuteness as may be, calculations and estimates of the sum or sums of money which may or will be necessary for completing each of the said canals, according to the plan or plans which may be adopted and recommended by them for the construction or formation of the same, and to cause the said calculations and estimates, and all surveys, maps, field-books, plans, draughts, and models authorized and directed by this act, or so many thereof as may be completed, together with a plain and comprehensive report of all their proceedings under and by virtue of this act, to be presented to the Legislature of this State within twenty days after the commencement of the next regular annual session thereof.

6. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer shall, on the warrant of the comptroller, pay to the order of a majority of the said commissioners, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, any sum or sums not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, and for which the said commissioners shall account to the comptroller of this State.

7. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the improvement of the internal navigation of this State," passed the 8th day of April, 1811, and the act entitled "An act further to provide for the improvement of the internal navigation of this State," passed June 19, 1812, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO MR. SERGEANT.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, after stating the actual or contemplated departure of Mr. SERGEANT, a member of this House from Pennsylvania, for Europe, and the little advantage and the needless trouble an election to supply his place for a short remainder of this session would afford, which consideration prevented Mr. S. from resigning his seat—moved, that Mr. SERGEANT have leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

This motion, was objected to by Mr. FORSYTH, as unprecedented and incorrect, inasmuch as the member in question had not appeared in his seat at the present session, and could not have leave of absence, where he had not been present.

Hence arose a brief debate.

Messrs. PITKIN, HOPKINSON, and GROSVENOR, and others, supported the motion, on the ground of precedents somewhat analogous, and on the merit of Mr. SERGEANT's claim to this indulgence, on account of the importance to the public of the business he had undertaken.

Messrs. NELSON, FORSYTH, and SOUTHDAR, opposed the motion, as well because without precedent applicable to the case as without a foundation in right or reason. It was no sufficient excuse, it was contended, particularly by Mr. NELSON, for a member of this House to abandon his duties, that he had accepted another post of honor or of profit; his duties and obligations in and to this House being paramount to any other except those of necessity.

By some gentlemen, both for and against the motion, it was contended and admitted, that Mr. SERGEANT's absence was a question between him and his constituents, with which the House had no concern. But, on the other hand, it was objected that to pass a vote giving him leave of absence, would be sanctioning what was certainly a relinquishment of his public duties.

At length, Mr. HOPKINSON varied his motion, so as to stand thus; that Mr. SERGEANT be excused from attending the House for the remainder of the session.

To this also Mr. FORSYTH objected, considering it in substance the same as the first.

The question on agreeing to it was taken—yeas 74, nays 81. So the motion was rejected.

THURSDAY, December 12.

Three other members, to wit: from New York WESTEL WILLOUGHBY, jun.; from Virginia, JOHN RANDOLPH; and from South Carolina, THOMAS MOORE, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of the Managers of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company, formerly presented. He moved that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. INGHAM said, he was friendly to the memorial, but suggested the propriety of its being referred to the Committee on Canals and Roads, already created.

Mr. WRIGHT remarked that this case was not an application for a canal to be laid out, or established by law, but was materially distinguishable from that case; that already a company had fixed the site, and made considerable progress in the business; but finding their funds inadequate to the object, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, had each, on their application, taken a considerable share in the stock; hence we were not left to infer the propriety of cutting the canal or the site of it. This memorial, after exhibiting the approbation of the private and public adventurers, asks the United States also to become adventurers and stockholders, to aid in the completion of so important a work. I, sir, can have no objection to that committee; but in the mass of their labors, I presume it will not be so exclusively attended to as if submitted to a select committee, to which I hope it may be referred.

It was referred, however, to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the Kentucky Abolition Society, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONDIOT, from the committee appointed on the petition of Doctor James Smith, reported a bill supplementary to the act heretofore passed, "for the encouragement of vaccination," which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, the select committee, to whom was referred the report of the acting Secretary of War, in pursuance of the resolution of the 4th instant, were instructed to inquire into the expediency of opening the road from Reynoldsburgh, in the State of Tennessee, to intersect the Natchez road, as surveyed and marked by the commissioners appointed for that purpose; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. BRYAN, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the payment of such articles of military clothing as may be due soldiers discharged from the Army of the United States.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying or repealing the act, entitled, "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise."

An engrossed bill for the relief of Nathaniel Williams, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill "to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the services of the militia." [This bill requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to credit and settle all accounts for services of any detachments of militia called into service under the authority of the States for the defence of any part of the United States against the invasion of the enemy during the late war, in the same manner and on the same principles as accounts for the services of militia called out under the authority of the United States—payment therefor to be made in six per cent. stock, to be created for the purpose, provided the States interested shall accept the same as full satisfaction for the claims.] The bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Military Committee, reported a bill to establish three additional Military Academies, (one in this District, one at Mount Dearborn, South Carolina, and one in the vicinity of Newport, Kentucky, at the confluence of the Ohio and Licking rivers.) The bill received the usual readings, and was committed to the same committee to whom was committed the bill for the establishment of a corps of invalids.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, offered for consideration the following resolution, under the impulse of positive information of its necessity; to prevent frauds committed by the sales of vessels abroad, and discharging the seamen without payment of their wages, &c.:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire what alterations are necessary in the several acts for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, and for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, or of those discharged abroad after the sale of their vessels.

After some observations from Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, respecting existing laws and usages on the subject, and by Mr. WILDE, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the act laying duties on retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, remarked, that, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, he certainly could have no objection to any inquiry which the House might direct; but, in his opinion, there never had been a moment when there was less inducement to repeal this tax than now; and stronger reasons might perhaps be adduced for increasing than for reducing it. He had risen only to say, that he did not wish those who, with him, would vote for the inquiry, because requested by a member, to be considered as at all pledged to co-operate in the ultimate object of the mover.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, (who suggested the great economy and saving to the United States, as well as benefit to the soldiers, of such a provision,) it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing a commutation for money of the bounty land to soldiers of the regular army, and that they report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ATHERTON, of New Hampshire, offered for consideration a resolution embracing the proposition of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in the following words:

"The Congress shall have power to establish a National University."

And on the usual question, will the House now proceed to the consideration of the resolution, it was decided in the negative, thus: For considering it 54, against it 86.

NATIONAL FLAG.

On motion of Mr. WENDOVER, of New York, the House proceeded to the consideration of his motion to appoint a committee to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States.

Mr. W. said he deemed it improper, in the present stage of the business, to discuss the merits of the proposition to alter the flag, as the object of his motion was inquiry only. As to any essential alteration, he hoped no man in the House would consent to change a flag, under which had been falsified the predictions of European orators and paragraphists, when they said the Yankee cock-boats were to be speedily driven from the ocean. His object, Mr. W. said, was to make an unessential variation. When first adopted, the flag bore one star and one stripe for every State; when two additional States entered the Union, the flag had been altered by a special act, by the addition of two stars and stripes, which made the flag correspond to the fact. Since that alteration, four States have been added, and the flag remains the same. Conceiving this not to be correct, and that the flag might be appropriately altered, he hoped the House would consent to the proposed inquiry.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Indiana, said he had, for his part, no objection to the proposed alteration; and suggested the expediency of some general law for altering the flag in future, by proclamation of the Executive, on the admission of new States into the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, was in favor of the inquiry, and for a reason different from that assigned by his colleague. He had been informed by naval gentlemen, that our flag could be seen and recognised on the ocean at a greater distance than that of any other nation. If the stripes and stars were increased, the flag would become less distinct to distant observation, which Mr. T. was desirous to prevent, and therefore was in favor of restoring the flag to its original character of thirteen stars and stripes, and establishing it permanently the same.

The motion of Mr. WENDOVER was agreed to, and a committee ordered to be appointed accordingly.

CARRIAGE TAX.

Mr. ROOF, of New York, prefaced a motion he rose to make by some observations to show the severity of the operation of the carriage tax on that description of carriages, (light wagons, &c.) used by farmers and people in moderate circumstances, on farming and market business, and occasionally in carrying families to church, or to see their neighbors, &c., and argued that, as the faith of the United States was no longer pledged to retain the tax, it should be dispensed with without prejudice to the public service. He then moved—

“That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the law laying a tax on carriages, &c., as relates to carriages and harness, not exceeding one hundred dollars in value.”

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, moved to amend this motion so as to strike out the limit to one hundred dollars in value, and thus to include an inquiry into the expediency of repealing the whole law. He predicated this motion on the inequality of the operation of this whole tax, which was very grievous in some sections of the country, while in the larger proportion it was scarcely felt.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, was opposed to Mr. WRIGHT's motion, thinking that no tax could be more equitable than a tax on luxury and expensive habits. As to the inequality of the tax, it was more than counterbalanced by the inequality, in an inverse proportion, of other taxes.

Mr. WRIGHT's amendment was lost; and Mr. ROOF's motion carried, but not by a large majority.

FRIDAY, December 13.

Another member, to wit: from New York, WILLIAM IRVING, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. ARCHER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Hartford county, in the State of Maryland, praying that a law be passed prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of bread-stuffs, and the distilling of spirituous liquors from grain, in consequence of the short crops of those articles made at the last harvest, and the high price they now bear.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BERRS, from the committee appointed on the petition of Luther Bingham, made report, which was read: When Mr. BERRS reported a bill for the relief of Luther Bingham, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of opening a road from Louisville, on the Ohio, to Newcasile, and thence by Boone court-house, &c., to Cincinnati; and the Committee of Pensions were instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying to the heirs of Edward Abbott and John Abbott the pay due to them for services in the Revolutionary war.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the claim of Pentland, Hegins, and Co.; which, together with said petition, was referred, on motion of Mr. T. WILSON, to the Committee of Claims.

MILITIA OF THE STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of War, enclosing “A plan for classing and arming the militia, and for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasion,” in obedience to a resolution of this House passed on the 16th of April last; which were read and referred to the Committee on a re-organization of the Militia. The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 13, 1816.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, dated the 16th of April last, requesting the Secretary of War “to report, at an early day of the next session of Congress, a system for the organization and discipline of the militia, best calculated, in his opinion, to promote the efficiency of that force, when called into the public service,” I have the honor to submit the enclosed plan.

With sentiments of great respect, &c.

GEO. GRAHAM,

*Acting Secretary of War.*HENRY CLAY, Speaker House of Reps.

A Plan for classing and arming the militia, and for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the laws heretofore passed for those purposes.

The militia of the United States shall be classed by the proper authority of the several States and Territories, in the following manner:

Those between eighteen and twenty-one years of age, shall be called the minor class; those between the age of twenty-one and thirty-one years of age, shall be called the junior class; and those over thirty-one, and under forty-five years of age, shall be called the senior class of militia.

That the militia of the minor class shall be liable to be called into the service of the United States, within the State or Territory to which they belong, for a term not exceeding — months.

The militia of the senior class shall be liable to be called into the service of the United States, within the State or Territory to which they belong, and in the adjoining States and Territories, for a term not exceeding — months.

The militia of the junior class shall be liable to be called into the service of the United States, for the performance of any duty requireable of the militia under the Constitution of the United States, for a term not exceeding — months.

That when any portion of the militia of the junior class shall be called into the service of the United States, for a term exceeding — months, they shall, by the United States, be armed, equipped, and clothed, in the same manner as the regular troops.

That the militia of the minor and junior classes, of each division, shall be annually assembled at not more than two cantonments within the same, at such time and place, and for such periods, as shall be designated by the proper authority of the several States and Territories; during which time, they shall be trained under the authority of the States agreeably to the system, discipline, and police, which is or may be adopted for the government of the Army. And officers of experience shall be detailed by the Executives of the several States and Territories, who shall, at the times and places appointed, organize the militia so assembled, into companies, battalions, regiments and corps, and command the same accordingly, during their encampment: Provided, That it shall be the duty of all non-commissioned officers, under thirty-one years of age, who may not be detailed for command, punctually to attend such encampment of their division, and act in any capacity of staff, or non-commissioned officer, which shall be assigned them: Provided also, That the militia of the said minor and junior classes, belonging to the cavalry, shall attend, and be organized and instructed as infantry.

That whilst the militia are so assembled, they shall be subsisted and equipped at the expense of the United States, provided they shall be called out and embodied by the several States, for a period not less than — weeks.

That the militia shall be organized by the Legislatures of the several States and Territories, into divisions, brigades, regiments, and corps; and that the organization of the regiments of infantry, riflemen, and cavalry, shall be the same as is now prescribed for the organization of the infantry of the United States. A brigade shall be composed of four regiments of infantry, one regiment of riflemen, one battalion of artillery, (to be organized as the corps of artillery of the regular army is now organized,) and of as many troops of cavalry as the Executives of the several States and Territories may authorize, not exceeding —.

And the privates of the rifle regiment, and of the light companies of each regiment of infantry, shall be composed of men between the ages of eighteen and thirty-one years. Two brigades shall form a division.

That there shall be erected in each State and Territory, by the United States, one or more arsenal or depot for arms, equipments, tents, and equipage, from which supplies shall be furnished upon requisitions of the Executives of States or Territories, made upon the War Department, from which all orders for the delivery of supplies must be given; and the arms and equipments so delivered shall be charged to the States and Territories, under the provisions of the act of April 23, 1808, for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia: Provided, That, in lieu of the appropriation under that act, there shall be applied, annually, under the direction of the President of the United States, the sum of — dollars.

That such tents and camp equipage as may be delivered to the militia, shall be receipted for at the depots, by officers designated for that purpose by the Executives of the several States and Territories, and charged to them: Provided, That credit shall be given for all such as may be returned without other damage than the usual injury of service.

That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or, in the opinion of the President, shall be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be his duty to call forth such numbers of the militia as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion.

That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof be obstructed, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested by law in the marshals, it shall be the duty of the President to call forth such portion of the militia as may, in his opinion, be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed.

That, whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to call forth the militia for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be his duty forthwith, by proclamation, to command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a time to be limited in the proclamation.

That in case of an insurrection in any State or Territory against the Government thereof, it shall be the duty of the President, on the application of the Legislature of such State or Territory, or of the Executive of such State or Territory, when the Legislature thereof cannot conveniently be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any State or Territory as may, in his opinion, be sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

That whenever, from any of the occurrences herein mentioned, it shall become the duty of the President to call forth the militia, he may require the Governor or Commander-in-chief of the militia in any State or Territory, or such officer of the militia as he may judge expedient, to execute his orders, so far as they may be applicable to their respective commands.

That whenever any part of the militia shall be called into the service of the United States, their organization shall be the same as may, at the time, be provided by law, for the organization of the Army of the United States; except when called out by companies, corps, regiments, or brigades, when they shall preserve their local organization.

That the militia employed in the service of the United States shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, which are, or shall be, provided for the government of the Army of the United States.

That every officer or non-commissioned officer, who shall fail to obey the orders of the President, or the orders of a superior officer of the militia, which may be issued in virtue of such orders, in any of the cases before recited, for calling forth the militia, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding — months' pay, nor less than — months' pay, which he would be entitled to receive if he were in the actual service of the United States for life, or such term of years as shall be determined and judged by a court martial.

That every officer, non-commissioned officer, musician and private of the militia, who shall be detached as aforesaid, and shall disobey the orders of the President, or of any superior officer, for the purposes of carrying into effect the object herein contemplated, shall be liable to be tried by a court martial, and receive such punishment as is pointed out by the martial law for similar offences; and, moreover, the non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, detached as aforesaid, or shall be accepted as substitutes, as hereinafter mentioned, who shall refuse or neglect to march and join his corps, when ordered so to do by his superior officer in the detachment, shall be considered as a deserter from the service of the United States, and shall be dealt with accordingly: Provided, nevertheless, That any non-commissioned officer, musician, and private of the militia, who shall be detached for the service of the United States as aforesaid, shall have a right to furnish an able-bodied man belonging to the militia as a substitute.

That regimental chaplains in the militia which have been, or shall be, called into the service of the United States, shall receive the same monthly pay and rations as a captain of infantry, with the addition of forage for one horse; and whenever called forth into the service of the United States, division quartermasters shall be entitled to the pay, emoluments, and allowance of a deputy quartermaster general; brigade quartermasters to the pay, emoluments, and allowance of an assistant deputy quartermaster general; and regimental quartermasters to the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant of infantry, and sixteen dollars per month in addition thereto, and forage for one horse; division inspectors shall be entitled to the pay, emoluments, and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel of infantry; brigade majors to the pay, emoluments, and allowances of a major of infantry; aids-de-camp to major generals to the pay, emoluments, and allowances of a major of cavalry; and aids-de-camp to brigadier generals to the pay, emoluments, and allowances of a captain of cavalry.

That the expenses incurred, or to be incurred, by marching the militia of any State or Territory of the United States to their places of rendezvous, in pursuance of a requisition of the President, or which shall have been, or may be, incurred in cases of calls made by the authority of any State or Territory which shall have been, or may be, approved by him, shall be adjusted and paid in like manner as the expenses incurred after their arrival at such place of rendezvous, on the requisition of the President: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be considered as authorizing any species of expenditure previous to arriving at the place of rendezvous, which is not provided, by existing laws, to be paid for after their arrival at such place of rendezvous.

That in all cases when a brigade of militia shall be called into the service of the United States, it shall be the duty of the brigade major of such brigade to inspect and muster the same, and sign the muster rolls. If less than a brigade of militia be called into the service of the United States, then it shall be the duty of a brigade major of the division wherein such militia may rendezvous, to inspect and muster the same, and sign the muster rolls; two musters to be made in the manner aforesaid, one on the assembling, and the other on the discharge of such militia. If it should so happen that there be no brigade major in the brigade, where such militia shall be called out, or in the division where they shall rendezvous, the commanding officer may direct any officer, under the rank of lieutenant-colonel, to inspect and muster the militia so called forth.

That no writ or civil process, issuing from any court of the United States, shall be served upon any militia man, or levied upon his property, while performing militia duty in the service of the United States; nor shall any judgment be entered in the said courts, in any of the aforesaid cases.

All offences committed by the officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, or musicians of the militia, subsequent to their detachment for the service of the United States, or orders to march for that service agreeably herewith, and before their assembling at the appointed place of rendezvous, shall be tried by courts martial, to be composed of militia officers only, of the State or Territory to which such delinquents shall belong, not in the actual service of the United States. All offences committed by the officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, or musicians of the militia, whilst in the actual service of the United States, shall be tried by courts martial composed of militia officers only in the service of the United States: Provided, That offences committed whilst in the service of the United States may be tried and punished, although the term of service of the delinquent may have expired, and the court martial for the trial of such offences shall be composed of militia officers, without regard to their having been in the service of the United States.

That if any delinquent, directed to be summoned to appear before a court martial for neglect or refusal to obey the orders of the President, shall be absent when any non-commissioned officer shall call to summon him, a copy of the summons or written notice thereof, signed by him, and left with some person, of suitable age and discretion, at the usual place of abode of such delinquent, at least ten days previous to the day of appearance, shall be held and taken to be a sufficient summons of such delinquent; and in case of the non-appearance of such delinquent, the court martial may proceed on his trial in the same manner as if he had appeared and plead not guilty of the charge exhibited against him.

That it shall be the duty of the president of any court martial, for the trial of militia, if required, and upon his being duly satisfied that such testimony is material to the trial, to issue his precept, directed to any person to be summoned as a witness, commanding his or her attendance at such court, to testify for or against the person to be tried, as the case may be; and any witness having been duly summoned, and failing to appear without a reasonable excuse, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding fifty dollars, to be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States, by bill, plaint, or information, in any court of competent jurisdiction. And if any witness, when called upon for that purpose, shall refuse to testify, or shall behave with contempt to the court; or if any other person shall use any menacing words, signs, or gestures, in presence thereof, or shall cause any riot or disorder therein, it shall be lawful for such court to punish every such offender by imprisonment, for a term not exceeding one month, at the discretion of the court.

That, for the purpose of carrying into execution the sentence, judgment, or order of any court martial, for any of the offences specified in the last clause of the preceding article, it shall be lawful for the court to issue an order to any commissioned officer of the militia, not below the rank of captain, commanding him to carry the same into effect by military force, whose duty it shall be to obey the same, and execute the order accordingly.

That on the trial of delinquents for offences not capital, by any such court martial, the deposition of witnesses taken before a justice of the peace, or other person authorized to take affidavits to be read in any court of record in the State or Territory where the same shall be taken, may be read in evidence, provided the prosecutor and person accused are present at taking the same, or are duly notified thereof. And further, that the returns of captains, or other commanding officers of companies of delinquents draughted or ordered into the service of the United States, who shall have refused or neglected to enter the same, sworn to as aforesaid, shall be competent evidence of the facts therein contained.

That if any person shall willingly swear false before any such court martial, or in any affidavit or deposition taken as aforesaid, he or she shall be adjudged to be guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, and shall be indicted, tried, and punished accordingly, by any court of competent jurisdiction, in the State or Territory where such offence shall be committed.

TONNAGE DUTIES.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, from the Committee of Ways and Means, introduced the following report and bill:

The Committee of Ways and Means, who have been instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," so far as it relates to duties on tonnage, report:

That it appears, by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which accompanies this report, that, under the construction put by the Treasury Department upon "the act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," the duty paid upon foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States has been two dollars per ton, as well since as before the 30th of June last. The committee have no hesitation in recommending to the House a bill, which will make the rate of duty upon the tonnage of vessels engaged in a trade which is open to American navigation, the same as is provided by the act of July 20th, 1790. By this act the duty upon vessels of the United States entering from a foreign port, is six cents per ton; on vessels built within the United States, after the 20th day of July, 1789, but belonging wholly or in part to subjects of foreign Powers, thirty cents per ton, and on other vessels fifty cents per ton. This low rate of duty cannot prudently be applied to vessels engaged in a trade between the United States and ports from which American tonnage is excluded. The subject of such trade has been referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, and the second section of the bill proposed is intended only to continue it in the state in which it has been placed by the construction of the act of the last session, until that committee can have time to mature a more extensive and adequate remedy for the embarrassments of our navigation. The bill proposed contains a reference to the act of 1790, instead of a repetition of its enactments. A different course, though it might be more regular, would spread upon the statute book many minute provisions, which the passage of a navigation law, before the close of the session, might modify or repeal.

A Bill supplementary to "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

Be it enacted, &c., That the tonnage duties to be paid by ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States, excepting, only, such foreign ships or vessels as shall be entered from any foreign port or place, to or with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, shall be the same as are provided by the act, entitled "An act imposing duties on the tonnage of ships or vessels," passed on the twentieth day of July, in the year of our Lord 1790. Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed in any wise to impair any rights and privileges which have been, or may be, acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty on tonnage of vessels.

And be it further enacted, That, on all foreign ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States before the thirtieth day of June next, from any foreign port or place to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, there shall be paid a duty at the rate of two dollars per ton. And the duties provided by this act shall be levied and collected in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as are prescribed by law in relation to the duties upon tonnage now in force.

The bill was committed.

UNIFORM BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill "to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy."

In introducing the bill, Mr. H. observed, that the committee hastened to bring this subject before Congress, under an impression of its great importance, and with the hope that the House would give the subject an early consideration. The change a few years ago in the political relations of the United States, and the corresponding course of commerce, produced embarrassments among commercial men, some of them attended with the most serious consequences. If it was the disposition of Congress to afford them some relief in this way, the sooner it was done, the better; if not, the earlier this determination was known, the sooner those interested would be relieved from suspense. The late decision of one of the State courts respecting the validity of acts of insolvency of one State in other States, &c., had produced an uncertainty on this subject, which seemed to require the establishment, by the General Government, of some rules to operate with equal effect throughout the Union. This he suggested as another reason why Congress should give the subject a serious consideration. The frauds which take place under the State insolvent laws, giving to one creditor unjust preference over another, &c., Mr. H. said, afforded another argument in favor of the establishment of a uniform system, and ought to induce the House to give an early consideration to the bill which the committee had instructed him to report.

The bill received the usual readings and commitment.

COMPENSATION TO LATE OFFICERS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Military Committee, reported the following bill:

A Bill making donations of land to the disbanded officers of the late Army.

Be it enacted, &c., That donations of land be granted to all the officers of the regular army who have been disbanded as supernumeraries, either in consolidating regiments or corps during the late war, or in reducing the army conformably to the act of March the third, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, as follows, to wit: to each major general, one thousand two hundred and eighty acres; to each brigadier general, one thousand one hundred and twenty acres; to each colonel and lieutenant colonel, nine hundred and sixty acres; to each major, eight hundred acres; to each captain, six hundred and forty acres; to each subaltern, four hundred and eighty acres; and to officers of the medical and other staff, who have no rank, in proportion to their pay according to the scale aforesaid.

The bill took the usual course of reading and commitment.

THE EXCISE ON SPIRITS.

Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, rose to propose a resolution to the House. His object in offering it thus early was, that Congress might not make such an impression on the public funds as to make his motion inapplicable. He said he discovered, from the President's Message, that, after meeting every demand on the Treasury, and many of them were of an extraordinary character, arising from the late war, there would remain in the Treasury, at the close of the year, an excess of nine millions of dollars; and also that, on making a fair and accurate calculation of the amount necessary to support the civil list, military and naval establishments, paying the interest, and gradually redeeming the principal of the public debt, there would remain a surplus of five millions of dollars beyond the necessary annual expenditure. In that case, the excise could certainly be dispensed with. He, therefore, meant to make a motion to bring into view that object, before some extraordinary disposition was made of the public money; inasmuch as there was already on the table a bill to establish a National University, the first cost of which was to be $200,000, without taking into view its endowment; another bill for three or four additional Military Academies, which would cost the nation between five hundred thousand and a million of dollars; another for a corps of invalids of 2,000 men, which is to cost a million a year or more; and a proposition to commute the bounties of land given to the soldiers into specie, which will cost perhaps ten millions more. He wished first to see the excise taken off, and then, if any surplus remained, they might talk, if they chose, about Military Academies and Invalid Corps. After adding that the tax in question was a peculiarly oppressive one, and operated with great inequality, Mr. H. offered the following resolution, with a view to call for the consideration of it at a future day:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to repeal the existing duties on licenses to distillers, and to lay other duties in lieu of those at present imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors,' except such parts thereof as may enable the Government to collect the sums now due under said act, or may become due before the repeal of said act takes effect."

The question being stated, on ordering this resolve to lie on the table—

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, said he was glad of the course the gentleman from Kentucky had given to his resolution, supposing that he meant to permit it to lie on the table until the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury should come before the House. When that report should arrive, the view which the gentleman from Kentucky and the House would take of that subject, would be different from that which they would now take. By inferences, drawn from the amount receivable into the Treasury, and not the amount actually accrued; from an amount from which no deductions were made for claims to come in under appropriations of the last session—he was satisfied an erroneous impression had been made on the House by the Message, both in reference to the disposable surplus in the Treasury, and to the proportion between the annual expenses and the annual receipts in the Treasury. From the surplus estimated, must be deducted the amount of appropriations for the payment of demands not yet rendered but forming claims on that surplus. On a full examination and due estimate of the expenses and future receipts into the Treasury, Mr. L. said, he was satisfied even the gentleman from Kentucky would entertain views of this subject widely different from those he now expressed.

The motion of Mr. HARDIN lies on the table.

COMMISSIONER OF CLAIMS.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Kentucky, moved to instruct the Committee of Claims to inquire into the expediency of remunerating Henry Brothers, now of Kentucky, for losses sustained on the Niagara frontier by the United States Army, and the enemy.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, rose to inquire whether this case was not included in the act of last session, for compensating claimants for certain lost or destroyed property.

Mr. FLETCHER said, he did not consider it to be included within that law; but, though the case was not embraced by that law, he was satisfied Congress would recognise its justice, and direct it to be paid.

Mr. FORSYTH said, his chief object was to take this method of apprizing the House of the fact, that the execution of that law was not suspended, but that under it claims were daily decided, of the same character as that which the gentleman from Kentucky considered not to come within the act.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, said, it was impossible to say whether the case embraced in this resolution was, or was not, proper to be provided for, since none of the circumstances had been stated; but certain it was, that the act of the last session had not authorized the payment of any such claim.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he was glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio had made his opposition to this motion, not from any opposition to its merits, but to suit a different proposition of his own, which the House had more than once refused to consider, and which he hoped would again be refused whenever he should call it up. The resolution now before the House was one almost, of course, such as would be adopted at the request or suggestion of any member of the House—a mode of proceeding arising from the necessity of the case, documents to support the claim being sent on without any accompanying petition. In relation to the proposition the gentleman had alluded to, it was not before the House now, and could not be debated. Whenever it was, Mr. J. said, he, too, should take occasion to say what he knew of the law relating to the payment for lost property, and of its execution.

Mr. FORSYTH said, it was certain, indeed, that his proposition had not been taken up when he asked for it; but it had been only once refused, and he hoped it would not be again. If it were proper here to enter into the question, he thought he could satisfy the House that the course which he had proposed was not improper. There is, said he, a law in existence, under which such claims are settled. The Commissioner does settle such claims; he has settled them, and would, I presume, settle this claim. He wished the House to be apprized of the fact, that, though there was no law authorizing payment of such claims, the Commissioner acted as if there were.

Mr. FLETCHER's motion having been agreed to nem. con., Mr. FORSYTH called up his motion, in the following words:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to order the further execution of the said act to be suspended, until the subject shall be disposed of by this House.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he thought no man could doubt the propriety of doing something on this subject, if he would properly reflect on it. One part of the act had been suspended by the President, who suggested in his Message the propriety of revising other parts of the act; which proposition, as well as an inquiry into the acts of the Commissioner, was now before a committee of the House. From want of understanding, or from want of integrity, incorrect decisions had certainly been made by the Commissioner. It was a little extraordinary, Mr. F. said, after what had taken place, that the Commissioner should be permitted to execute the remainder of the act—to pass judgments to an indefinite amount; these judgments to be immediately paid at the Treasury, without revision or control. This required some interference on the part of this House. We can only judge what is to come from what is past. We know that erroneous decisions have been made by the Commissioner; and may presume that others will be. Mr. F. said, there appeared to him no reasonable objection to the shape in which he had brought his motion before the House, yet he was not wedded to it. If any other course should be thought better, to attain the same object, he should not object to it.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, was not in favor of this motion. It had been alleged that the decisions of the Commissioner, under one section of the act, had been incorrect; but even the gentleman from Georgia himself had not alleged that decisions under other branches of the law were incorrect. Why, then, would the gentleman suspend the operations of a public officer, against which nothing had been alleged? For, Mr. McK. said, he heard no allegation made of incorrect decision in regard to any other class of cases than those coming under the ninth section of the act, which the President had already suspended. He could, therefore, see no necessity or propriety in extending the resolution so widely as to embrace cases, on the decision of which even rumor threw no blame. Besides, the subject was under inquiry by several committees. Why not let the committees already appointed discharge their duty? Why take up the subject, and act thus prematurely? For any decision must be premature, made in the absence of that information which the House had taken the usual and regular mode of obtaining.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, rose, he said, to ask whether any answer had yet been received to the call of the House on the President for information on this subject. [Being answered in the negative, Mr. G. proceeded.] He said he would not vote to suspend the execution of any law in which the citizens had a right, without proper documentary evidence before him. Gentlemen might make statements, but on what foundation? Public rumor. After the call on the Executive for information, was this a proper ground, or the proposed a proper mode of proceeding? Before a single document was before the House, it would be a most strange thing to see this House voting to request the suspension of the execution of an act, respecting which so many persons from various parts of the country were attending in this city. He was clearly in favor of waiting till the House had some ground of proceeding. Without going into the question at large, it appeared to him, he said, it would be a most novel proceeding for this House to undertake to request of the President the suspension of a law, by which course an independent public officer would be arrested in the discharge of his official duties. If it were to be done at all, it ought to be by joint resolution.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, said, he had been opposed to this resolution the other day, because he believed, as the President had advised the revision of other parts of the act besides the ninth section, that the Commissioner would not have proceeded, but would of course have stayed his proceedings till Congress had passed on the subject. The Committee of Claims, to whom the President's Message was referred, had taken the subject into serious consideration. This morning they had had the Commissioner before them, and clearly ascertained that he was going on under every section of the act, except the ninth. I take also upon myself, said Mr. Y., the responsibility of stating that some decisions have been made, respecting which the Commissioner has been interrogated, as much without authority as the cases which come under the ninth section. He, therefore, believed it was necessary that the execution of the act should be suspended until it was revised. Under other sections of the act decisions had been made, which were as groundless as any which had been made under the ninth section. As for the authority of this House to make the request of the President, and of the President to suspend the law, Mr. Y. said, he had no question. The Commissioner was a mere ministerial officer, subject to the control of the Executive; he was expressly made so by the act itself, if he had not been so otherwise.

Commissioner of Claims.

H. OF R.

Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, in referring to the act for the adjustment of the claims, said, it had been familiarly called at the last session the Kentucky Horse bill; its title would, it appeared, have been more appropriate, had it been called a bill for the benefit of the District of Columbia. He doubted, he said, whether an act could be suspended without the authority of all the branches of the Government. The section in the act referring to the President's control, was designed to establish rules of evidence for the guidance of the Commissioner, and not to take away his independence or right of decision. He said he could not agree that Mr. Lee was merely a ministerial officer; he was a judicial officer, having a right to expound the law, and decide on the evidence before him. A constable, sheriff, or marshal, were ministerial officers, because they executed the process issued by the courts; but, he contended, the President had no more right to remove the Commissioner, than to remove the Supreme Court of the nation. The mode and degree of adjudication was all that the President had a right to prescribe. He wished that the resolution should lie on the table, until it should come before the House under other circumstances. The committees appointed on the subject would no doubt report in a few days. The House, he inclined to think, could not properly pass the resolve; and, if they did, what would be the effect? To the West, the sufferers by the war lived at a distance of seven or eight hundred miles, and their claims had scarcely begun to arrive. Suspend this act for a month, he said, and probably three-fourths of those claims would go unmanaged, and the losers receive no compensation for their losses, unless they would employ a couple of lawyers, able lawyers as the Commissioner had notified the people, to carry through their twenty-five dollar claims. The people of the West look to their Representatives to do this business for them. By suspending the law, said he, you prevent this, to the great injury of the claimants. Mr. H. concluded by saying, that he was not quite sure that Congress could even suspend the law by joint resolution.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose to make the suggestion to the House that they should act on the subject now, if at all. The House had been informed by the President that erroneous decisions had been made by the Commissioner under other sections of the law than the ninth; and the Commissioner, going on in the same spirit of construction, might commit error in many other cases. If the law was suspended at all, therefore, it was important it should be done now, for the reason that when the Commissioner has decided, his decision is a sufficient warrant for the money; and some individuals would receive money for claims of a character which Congress, in revising the law, might not choose to allow to others. Mr. B. was, however, clearly of opinion, that the House could not act upon the law, but in conjunction with the Senate; for a suspension is a qualified repeal of a law, and the same power only can repeal which enacts it.

Mr. TAUL, of Kentucky, agreed in the view which his colleague had taken of the proposition before the House, which was certainly one of the most extraordinary proceedings ever heard of. At the last session, the act referred to had passed by a large majority, and the Commissioner appointed had proceeded to execute it. The Executive, conceiving the Commissioner to have expounded this law erroneously, had directed a particular section to be reserved for the decision of Congress. Mr. T. conceived, that, to pass this resolution, under the circumstances, would be to pass an indirect censure on the Executive. So far, said Mr. T., as I have any knowledge of the decisions of the Commissioner, he has given rigid constructions to the law, operating with much severity on the Western people, and subjecting them to much trouble and inconvenience, which had not been anticipated. Till the House was explicitly informed that the Commissioner was giving erroneous decisions at this time, Mr. T. hoped the House would not adopt a course which would operate so hardly on claimants from the Western country. If confidence is to be refused to this officer, why is not his conduct arraigned in a proper manner? Mr. T. said he had not heard it intimated that confidence was not to be reposed in the Commissioner. The only error imputed to him, was in construing the ninth section (providing for payment for houses occupied as military depots) to include houses in which troops were at the time, or had been any short time previously, stationed. Decisions under that construction had been suspended, and Mr. T. hoped the resolution would not be agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, was also opposed to the resolution. If the Commissioner had acted correctly, it was as the law intended, and there was no motive for suspending the law; if incorrectly, the proper course would be to remove the officer. Mr. R. doubted, he said, the power of the Executive to suspend a law of the land; he could see that such a power might be exercised in a manner very dangerous to the liberties of the country, without referring to any particular case. Mr. R. doubted also the propriety of acting on this subject from the motives suggested by the gentleman from Georgia. The suspension (temporary repeal) of a law should be as deliberate as the passage of the act. Let us not pursue a course, in respect to which our powers are very doubtful. He lived in a distant part of the country, in regard to which, though many claims have been decided nearer the Seat of Government, the law is as yet a dead letter, as it is to all parts of the country at the same distance. In regard to the State of Louisiana, not a single claim had yet come before the Commissioner; and Mr. R.

H. OF R.

Commissioner of Claims.

was not, therefore, disposed to arrest the proceedings of the Commissioner at the moment the distant claims might be expected to present themselves. In regard to the Commissioner, Mr. R. said, his being retained in office by the President was presumptive evidence in his favor. He concluded his remarks by expressing his doubt of the propriety of suspending the operation of a law, and particularly the propriety of this House acting on it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, the discussion which had already taken place on this subject would save him and the House the pain of many remarks he would otherwise have made. He presumed a little more information in his possession, and known to some others, would enable the House to decide correctly on this question. I venture to say, continued Mr. J., and I believe it is not in opposition to anything suggested by any other gentleman, that since the sitting of Congress there has not been any decision of the Commissioner which any member on this floor has examined, and will say that it contravenes the statutes. I have made it my duty to make proper inquiry, and do say there has not been a decision that any member of this House or the President of the United States would not approve; that the decisions of the Commissioner have been restricted to cases without doubt, and that it is his solemn determination, not out of respect to the Legislature merely, but out of respect to himself, on account of the difficulties in which he might otherwise be involved, to suspend all cases in respect to which a doubt could be raised. He is passing only on cases in which there can be no question. Under this declaration from me, said Mr. J., and knowing that Mr. Lee has rejected, from scrupulous motives, cases which he ought to have passed, I hope the House will not agree to a measure which will arrest the decision of a numerous class of cases of horses lost for want of forage, horses killed in battle, &c. One word as to alarm in regard to the decisions of the Commissioner. Of that gentleman, Mr. J. said, he knew but little; but as much as he did know, he was a man of integrity, and beyond the reach of any imputation of corruption; and, if he had erred, as the members of this House might and did differ about the construction of a law, was it to be expected, Mr. J. asked, that under such a law there would be no diversity of sentiment? Nothing had happened in regard to the law, which I did not expect; the 9th section particularly involved questions of much difficulty, under the laws of nations, and the whole act gave a latitude of discretion to the Commissioner, respecting any exercise of which there must be different opinions—embracing cases respecting which it was as difficult to decide, as to separate the colors of the rainbow. No case of wanton destruction by the enemy had been passed upon by the Commissioner; and any gentleman who took the trouble to examine the evidence, would see that the cases were so strongly made out, that no man in this House would have decided differently from the Commissioner. In regard to the property in our sight, that had been paid for, (Carroll's building,) Mr. J. said he found, on examination of the evidence, that it had been proved by the acting Secretary of War, by citizens, and by persons who had belonged to the British army, that the building had been occupied by infantry and cavalry, above and below stairs, and that marks of the occupation, arms, harness, &c., were found through the whole premises; in consequence of which General Ross had directed it to be set on fire by rockets. In cases of this kind, Mr. J. said he would act with delicacy, and would not take a course calculated to destroy the confidence of the people in any man who had passed before the Senate, and who was passing judicially on cases highly important to individuals interested. It was expected there would be difficulty under the law, and when the House came to discriminate in legislating anew on the subject, they must do it nicely, and will do it with difficulty. In regard to the suspension of proceedings under a part of the law, the President supposed he had the power, and he had exercised it. Mr. J. took this occasion to observe that the character of the President had been mistaken and undervalued before his Administration commenced. He was a man decisive in his sentiments; and, when he saw his way, fearless of consequences, took upon himself a responsibility at which most men would stand appalled. This, at the close of his Administration, all would now acknowledge. That man, then, who never failed in his duty, had taken hold of but one section of the act. The inconveniences of the suspension of the whole law would be very great, compelling the claimants to go to expenses, &c., and the construction was now sufficiently rigid. From every mounted man whose horse was lost, the Commissioner deducted forty cents per day (allowed for the use of the horse) from the amount at which his lost horse is valued; and other cases Mr. J. had presented, which he thought within the spirit of the law, but which the Commissioner had rejected. Would the House, then, come forward and by resolution of one branch of the Legislature suspend a law, especially when he believed that the opposition to the law arose, with some allowance for honest difference of opinion as to the decisions, from the original opposition to the law? Mr. J. hoped that the Chairman of the Committee of Claims, a man of business and a discreet man, would, during the session, report a bill so to define the duties of the Commissioner as to put them in a situation beyond doubt or cavil.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, said that it appeared, from the course of debate, that the objections to the resolution before the House were of a twofold character: the first relating to the necessity of interference; the second to the form which the proposed interference, if made, ought to take. It was not, perhaps, easy to ascertain whether it was the judgment of the House, that there was an error in the law or in the administration of the law, or, it may be, in both. So far as regarded error in the law, there was no remedy but to repeal or amend it. If in the execution of the law error was apparent, he concluded that the Executive would exercise his Constitutional authority in the case. The subject was already referred to two committees in this House, and, if the House were to act further on the subject, the proper course would be to amend the resolution, so as to make it declare that it was expedient to suspend the law, &c., and thereon found a bill in regular form for that purpose. Mr. W. was wholly opposed to the interference of this House, singly and separately, on this occasion. If they acted on it at all, it ought to be by law. He did not know that, by passing the resolution as it stood, they would violate their duty, but they would act nugatorily. If the President had the power to suspend the law, the interposition of this House was not necessary; if he had not the power, this resolution would not give it to him. The other branch of the Legislature must be consulted to give efficacy to the resolution. Mr. W. then moved to amend the resolution to read:

"That it is expedient to suspend all further proceedings under the act, entitled an act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes; and that the Committee of Claims be instructed to bring in a bill for that object."

Mr. FORSYTH objected to this amendment as tending to produce delay. The subject was indeed as fully before the Committee of Claims now, as it could be by any resolution referring it to them. The object of his motion was only to suspend the act promptly, until the committee should have time to act on it.

Mr. WEBSTER rejoined, that the amendment would make the resolution imperative on the committee, who could immediately introduce a bill in conformity to it.

Mr. PIRKIN, of Connecticut, said he had been originally opposed to the law in question, and had voted against it. But in the proposition now before the House, an important principle was involved, whether it was in the power of the House to suspend a law, or request the President to suspend it. Neither this House nor the President has the power to suspend the operations of a law passed by all the branches of the Government. It requires the same power to suspend as to make a law. Mr. P. said he did not know that a joint resolution would not operate as an act; but he denied that this House alone, the President alone, the Senate alone, or any two of them, had the power to suspend the operation of a law. He was opposed, he repeated, to the appointment of a Commissioner to decide these claims, believing they ought to be managed by the Heads of Departments, who were a little more responsible for their conduct than a Commissioner. But, said Mr. P., shall we break through the Constitution, and say we will suspend a law, because it would require time to go through the forms which the Constitution requires? He presumed not. If the Commissioner had acted so improperly as to require the suspension of his functions, the President has power already to suspend or remove the officer.

Mr. HULBERT, of Massachusetts, said, that he had voted in favor of this law at the last session. He regretted that he had done so, because he believed it had not been executed as it ought to have been. It had been said that the House had no information sufficiently authoritative to declare, that the Commissioner, in his decisions, had proceeded improperly. But, he said, had not the man in the highest office in the Union, charged with the supervision of the law, given the House information that, in his opinion, the law was so wrongly construed, that he thought it necessary to suspend the execution of it? If there was not conclusive evidence of error by the Commissioner, there was sufficient to satisfy the House that wrong had been done. It had been said that the President cannot suspend the execution of the law. In that, Mr. H. said, he agreed; but if gentlemen looked at the law, they would find it not of an ordinary kind. It was considered too great a power to give to any man to make these decisions, unless under the control of the Executive of the Union—the power of deciding away millions of millions of money—and the power was there subjected to such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the President. As the President has the power to make new rules whenever he believes the rules first established to be ineffectual, has he not of course authority to say to the Commissioner at any time: stop your decisions; I wish to make a new rule of decision, since I find those which I first established are not sufficient to keep you in a straight course? Nothing certainly could be more plain than the authority of the President to do this. It was certain that erroneous decisions had been made, and that millions of the public money might be thrown away if the proceeding was not corrected.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, referring to the President's Message on this subject, and quoting its contents, said, that he was in favor of a latitude of construction of the law, and of remuneration for losses. If every individual in the United States were paid for losses during the war, it would be a perfectly just principle, which would prevent one or two sections of the country from exclusively having their property sacrificed on the altar of the public good. The President, he said, had a Constitutional right to see that the laws were faithfully executed, and no doubt he would exercise it when necessary in other cases, as he had already done in one. The establishment of the office of Commissioner of Claims was intended to obviate the expense and vexation of examining every little case separately before this numerous tribunal. Of the correctness of the decisions which had been made, Mr. W. said he was not prepared to decide, until he heard the evidence; but sure he was that the President had the right to suspend those decisions, which he had exercised with delicacy, and had spoken of its exercise with deference to the opinions of the Commissioner. Now, instead of entering into a discussion of the true construction of the law, it would certainly be proper to await the evidence. To arraign the law in this manner before the House, was, he said, a disrespect to the authority which enacted the law, and who did it from a sincere devotion to the best interests of the country. If the facts were as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky in regard to Carroll's building; if the military had broken into the building, as they will do in search of quarters, and thus subjected it to destruction, the decision of the Commissioner was certainly correct. God forbid, he said, that he should wantonly hurt the feelings or character of any individual appointed to so high and responsible an office; he hoped this business would not be further proceeded in, unless to explain the true meaning of Congress in the law. It appeared strange to him, that after a large majority had united in passing a liberal act, it should be proposed, the moment its fruits were felt, to suspend the law. The whole of this proceeding went to implicate the officer. Mr. W. was for leaving this business with the Executive, who he had no doubt would properly exercise his authority in the case whenever necessary.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said, that he disagreed totally with his friend from Massachusetts, in the construction of the law. The gentleman had admitted, that in ordinary cases the President cannot suspend a law, but said that this law differed from other laws, in requiring the co-operation of the President in its execution. No power was given to the President, Mr. G. said, over this law more than to the Commissioner. The President was to prescribe certain rules, under which the Commissioner was to decide. The President might suspend the execution of this law, indeed, because he might refuse to perform his duties. That would not be a positive act of suspension, but a neglect on the part of the President. So might the Commissioner also act. The President, Mr. G. contended, had no more right to suspend the execution of this law than the judge, the marshal, or the sheriff to suspend the law he is bound to execute. Mr. G. here quoted the terms of the law, from which, he said, it manifestly appeared, that the duty of the Commissioner was to judge; the rules prescribed by the President were to apply to the manner (not to the act) of judging. Mr. G. said, he should vote in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. WEBSTER; but should then vote against the whole resolve. His reasons were, briefly, that the House was proceeding without proper information. A gentleman from North Carolina had told the House that, from the result of his inquiries, he was convinced the law had been improperly executed. The gentleman from Kentucky had told the House exactly the contrary, the Commissioner having to his knowledge rejected claims which he ought to allow. The whole proceeding at present was particularly wrong, when the nature of the case was justly viewed. There was, he said, no testimony or document before the House, except as to the ninth section of the act. A statement had been made by a gentleman that he suspected erroneous decisions had been made under other sections of the act; against that suspicion, was to be opposed the high character of the Commissioner himself, the declaration of a gentleman on this floor who had examined the evidence, and the President's Message. If on those grounds the House would (if they could) suspend this law, they might suspend any and every law. This House might, it was true, in a desperate case, send their Sergeant-at-Arms and bring this Commissioner in person before them, to stay his proceedings; but, he contended, that the probability was, from the testimony before the House, that the Commissioner was proceeding correctly, and that this was not a case calling for the interference of the House.

Mr. ROSS was opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire; and yet agreed with him in the proposition he had laid down that it was not in the power of the House to suspend a law for a day or an hour. He was in favor of the original proposition of Mr. FORSYTH, he said, not because he thought it in the power of the House of Representatives to suspend the execution of a law, but because he apprehended the President did possess the power of suspending the law, if he pleased, and that the House of Representatives may Constitutionally request of the President to exercise his Constitutional powers. To this proceeding there could be no legal objection. Whether he will pay deference to that request, when made, Mr. R. said, was for the President to decide. The real question is, does the President possess the Constitutional power of suspending the operation of this law? The gentleman from Connecticut had acknowledged that the President had the power of suspending this law, if not in one way, in another; and that he might remove the officer, which would be a suspension of the law until a successor should be appointed. There could be no doubt, he concluded, that the President had the power of suspending it. Doubts had arisen as to the execution of the law; the President himself had suggested them to Congress, and he might go further and say to the Commissioner, you shall delay further proceedings under the law until Congress shall decide on the question I have laid before them. What did the resolution propose, further than to request the President to do this? Mr. R. was decidedly in favor of passing it without the proposed amendment.

Mr. YANCEY restated the circumstance of the appearance of the Commissioner of Claims before the Committee of Claims this morning, and that an examination of some of his decisions had convinced Mr. Y. that they were not in conformity to the law. He would mention the circumstances of one, to enable the House to judge. A claim, rejected nearly unanimously by this House, had, since the passage of this law, been paid for under the 5th section of the act. The case of Mr. O'Neale was this, said Mr. Y., as it appeared before the Committee of Claims at a former session: He hired to an officer of the United States a vessel in the Chesapeake; it was stipulated that the vessel should be at the risk of the owners; she was continued in service for several days, after which the officer of the United States discharged the vessel out of the service of the United States. The enemy came near where the vessel lay, some time after that, and the commander thought proper to sink her, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. The loss thus incurred had been paid for under the 5th section of the bill, which provides that "where any property has been impressed, or taken by public authority, for the use or subsistence of the Army, during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof, deducting therefrom the amount which has been paid, or may be claimed for the use and risk of the same, while in the service aforesaid."

Mr. Y. asked gentlemen now, whether they were satisfied that there had been erroneous decisions under other sections of the bill than the 9th? Other vessels, he said, had been paid for under the same section. He appealed to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, who was a member of the committee, if these decisions were not equally as erroneous as the decision as to Mr. Carroll's house or Mr. Ringgold's ropewalk? Mr. Y. said he did not regret voting for this law at the last session, he believed the provisions highly beneficial, if properly construed. If the law had been misconstrued, it was not the fault of the law, but of those who had administered it. It was not, he said, necessary to speak of the integrity of the officer; that had not been arraigned. When it was, it would be time enough for gentlemen to defend it. It was of abuses of the law, of erroneous decisions under it, that Mr. Y. spoke. He conceived that this House had authority, and that it was their bounden duty to call on the President to suspend further proceedings under the act. If the provisions of the law required to be restricted, it would be reported accordingly to the House; if they could not get rid of the Commissioner in any other way, they might decide upon the claims embraced by the law being settled at some other office.

Mr. RANDOLPH considered this as a more important question than it had appeared to have been viewed by any gentleman who had spoken—a much more important question than any of mere profit and loss to the United States, or of malfeasance in office by any officer of the United States, however high or low. He submitted to the worthy gentleman from North Carolina, whether the whole scope of his observations did not go to impugn the conduct of the officer, and not touch the law? With the law, said Mr. R., I had nothing to do; but I do know, that in cases of comparatively small importance, in Governments like ours, the most baneful precedents creep in. He had no doubt, he said, from the representation of the gentleman from North Carolina, that much wrong had been done; but it did not follow that he would accept the first remedy. The patient was unquestionably sick; but it did not follow that he should swallow the first prescription of the first man he meets—the first nostrum offered to him. No doubt much wrong had been done, which it was not competent to this House to remedy; and that wrong might be done, which it might become the duty, the prerogative of this House to remedy. The question now was, however, whether it comported with the dignity of this House to go to the President, and request of him the removal of any petty officer, for of that description he considered this officer, being appointed pro hac vice, strictly ministerial, and subordinate to the Executive of the United States. Mr. R. said he would never compromise himself so far in his individual character, much less as a member of this House, as to ask of the Executive the appointment or removal, to or from any office, of any individual. But a much more important principle was involved in this discussion: Shall the House of Representatives be instrumental in introducing into the American Constitution a doctrine which has deluged the English nation with blood, which has occasioned a long, violent, and bloody war—a war which finally wrested from the Stuart family this prerogative? Mr. R. said he acquitted gentlemen of any such intention; he believed their intentions were pure, but he saw at once the danger of this suspending prerogative, for which the Commons of England contended, he knew not how long, and at length wrested from their sovereigns, being attributed to our Executive authority, differing so widely in its construction from that of monarchical Government. Mr. R. could not consent to it. If, said he, the House were to request the President to suspend this act, perchance some future President will suspend our statutes without our request, and for this reason, if he be competent to suspend an act, a mere resolution of this House does neither enlarge nor diminish his powers. Under this view of the case, if the decisions of the Commissioner were to take the last dollar from the Treasury, Mr. R. said, he would rather see it drained than see it admitted that the President of the United States had the power to suspend laws in any case.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose to ask of the gentleman from North Carolina whether he obtained the facts which he had stated from the Commissioner himself? If they were as stated, the case must be one not only of incorrect but of corrupt decision. If the gentleman had stated the real circumstances of the case, Mr. G. said he should deem it sufficient ground on which to institute against this officer a proceeding of a criminal nature.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, said that nothing was more important to this House than its character and dignity; nothing was more important to the nation, and nothing would tend more to sustain this character than that it should refrain from acts which it could not consummate. Suppose the resolution to pass, the request to be made of the President, and the President to order the suspension; suppose that the officer refused to suspend the law; the officer, said Mr. H., in doing so, stands authorized by the act of the Legislature; he not only successfully, but with impunity resists the requests of this House and the direction of the President. The President has by the Constitution no such power as that of suspending a law; and although the gentleman from Pennsylvania had laid down the position that he had the power to suspend this law, he had not proved it. Mr. H. held it most clear that the President has not the power, on the request of this House, to suspend the execution of any law.

Mr. HULBERT said he was satisfied that the grounds of the resolution were correct. It was not proposed to suspend the law, but the execution of the provisions of the law, specially confided by the act to the Executive. He thought the House had the power to ask this of the President, and he hoped they would exercise it.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said the defect alleged appeared not to be in the law, but in the execution of the law. If so, it was in the power of the Executive to dismiss the officer, without the interposition of this House. Mr. C. said he felt very little disposition to give his support to any proposition which should assume the idea of the power of this House to suspend a law. If the decisions of the Commissioner were such as had been represented, no amendment of the law could have any effect whatever, because the law did not even touch the case which had been stated. The evil appeared to be in the officer himself. It is in the President's power to remove that evil. In assuming power in this case, said Mr. C., we should act out of the line of our duty. If the President did not dismiss the officer, there was another remedy by the exercise of a power belonging to this House—that of impeachment.

Mr. YANCY again briefly stated the case of the decision in favor of Mr. O'Neale. He had not, he added, seen the evidence before the Commissioner, and did not know what it was—he took it to be the same, or the same in principle, as that which was formerly before the Committee of Claims in the same case, and from which Mr. Y.'s impression had been derived. Such was the case which had been favorably adjudged under the 5th section of the act.

Mr. FOSYTH said, that much of the debate had arisen from the introduction into the debate of a question not before the House. Various objections had been made—one of them of a novel character, that it would be undignified in this House to request the President to suspend the execution of the law. Mr. F. said, he presumed it was always consistent with the dignity of the House to perform the duties which the Constitution and their constituents had assigned to them. The first great duty of this House was to take care of the public money, and guard it from wasteful disbursement. Mr. F. said, gentlemen seemed to imagine, that this resolution was founded on the presumption that the power exercised by the President, under this particular act, had been properly exercised. Mr. F. said, he would have left this subject wholly to the discretion of the President, if he had been satisfied that that discretion would be properly exercised. But he believed it would not. There was evidence enough before the House to show, that as the President had directed the suspension of a part of the act, he ought to have gone further, and suspended the whole. Mr. F. said, he would state in addition some cases of decision, recently made by the Commissioner, with which he was not perfectly acquainted, but sufficiently so to satisfy him of their demerit. He had been at the Treasury this morning, and examined some of the awards which had been made. In one case, said he, I find the Commissioner has awarded to a man a sum of money for corn and potatoes trampled under foot by the United States' troops; and to another person the value of fifty-two rods of rail fence destroyed; these awards being in favor of men by the name of Moore and Evans. From the abstracts of the decisions he had seen, Mr. F. said, he was satisfied such decisions were erroneous. To prevent the decision of similar cases, he wished the House to interfere. One word as to the effect of a suspension of a particular class of cases—that of lost horses from the West. Without their aid, Mr. F. said, this act would never have passed this House. Honorable gentlemen, in the warmth of their feelings for that particular section of the United States, in gratitude for the services of its brave militia and volunteers during the war, had included in the act a variety of cases which ought never to have been sanctioned by this House. The House had been told the evidence in support of these claims was here. Would the suspension of the act diminish the weight of that evidence? Would it impair the force of it, to postpone the decision and the payment of the money for a month or six weeks? Mr. F. put it to gentlemen whether that consideration was sufficient to justify an opposition to the resolution now before the House. But even under that section of the bill, he had received it from the most correct authority, the Commissioner was about to give, if he had not already given, a construction which no man in this House would justify; he was about to extend the provisions of the act to officers of the regular army. Some such cases, it was his impression, had been decided before the proper authority had an opportunity of interfering. He hoped the House would reject the amendment, and agree to the resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH put it to the gentleman last up, whether his whole argument did not go to the officer, and not to the law; for, at the end of the suspension of the law for six weeks, we should have that or some other officer to execute the same law. Mr. R. wished to be understood not to mean to inculcate that officer; he knew nothing of his decisions; but he wanted to know whether, in these six weeks spoken of, the officer in question would become more competent to the discharge of his duties than he is now. The whole argument of the gentleman went to the question of requesting the President to suspend or remove the officer. As to the propriety of addressing the President to request him to remove any particular officer, Mr. R. said, he would not enter into that question now. As to the decisions of the officer, Mr. R. submitted whether, the conduct of the officer being under examination before a special committee, a sense of justice to the party in question did not require gentlemen to suspend their opinions in regard to the execution of the law, till they had a report from their committee. He asked gentlemen, suppose they could bring into court a case of extreme fault in the execution of his duties by a judge of the United States—would they request the President to suspend the law under which he was appointed? The more the gentleman from Georgia insisted on the misconduct of the officer, the more he convinced Mr. R. that he was wrong in the course he had taken. I cannot consent, said Mr. R., that whenever gentlemen come on this floor, and bring cases, however flagrant, of misconduct of public officers, that a suspension of the law under which they are appointed is to be the remedy. But one gentleman says, it is proposed to suspend not the law, but the execution of the law. Mr. R. said, he would leave it to the ingenuity of the gentleman from Massachusetts to explain the difference between two things, which were to his mind precisely of the same import.

Mr. HULBERT said a few words in explanation. His idea was, that to suspend certain proceedings under a law, was by no means to suspend the law itself.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, said he wished the gentleman from Georgia to point out what part of the Constitution or laws of the United States deprived a regular military officer of the same right which appertained to all other persons in the United States. If the law in question actually did not embrace the cases of regular officers who had lost property in the same way as militia officers, he could only say, in his opinion, its provisions were extremely partial and unjust. If the provisions of the act were general as to all officers of the United States, why were not the officers of the regular army as much entitled to its benefits as other citizens? He should like to know.

Mr. FORSYTH said he had referred only to the case of regular officers, because there was a special provision, by other acts, for their case; whilst there was none such, except in the act of last session, for militia officers. With respect to the question of the gentleman from Virginia, said Mr. F., I will answer it. I would not propose to remove a judicial officer, because the President has not the power; but if an officer over whom he has power, were to act with evident incorrectness, I would ask the President to remove that officer. I do not presume to say that the decisions of the Commissioner are erroneous or corrupt: I only state what I believe them to be. It may be, that after the production of evidence and its examination, it may appear that the judgments of the Commissioner are correct. My impression is to the contrary; that the more they are examined, the more erroneous they will appear. Suppose it should be found, Mr. F. said, that the Commissioner had been and yet was making erroneous decisions; would it not be the bounden duty of this House to inform the President, that he might suspend wholly the execution of that law which he had partially suspended? Was it not their bounden duty to guard the Treasury against this individual? Gentlemen appeared not to recollect the peculiar nature of this act; every judgment the Commissioner made, however erroneous, or however corrupt, was instantly paid at the Treasury of the United States, and the money beyond the control of this House. If there had been a controlling power; if there had been an appellate jurisdiction by which the acts of this Commissioner were to be revised and examined, he should never, he said, have thought of introducing the resolution. But it was directly the contrary. He trusted the House was satisfied that something should be done. He declared, he said, that he was a little surprised at the extraordinary indisposition to exercise a power of this sort. We have no objection, said he, to take up this subject, provided somebody stands between us and responsibility; but we wait for the President's direction before we will move in the case. I wish to do more, said Mr. F.,—I wish to give information to the President that it is in the opinion of this House that he has not done sufficient. The rules prescribed for the Commissioner were found insufficient; they were evaded—the whole operation of the law has been more than once suspended to prevent further violation, and the evidence in the cases has changed its shape to suit the new regulations. Mr. F. hoped the resolve would be passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, claimed the attention of the House for one moment, on a matter of fact. The Chairman of the Committee of Claims, (Mr. YANCEY,) in explanation to the House of his view of the question, did not pretend to state, that he had himself examined one individual case of the Commissioner's decisions. The honorable gentleman who introduced this resolution had said, in his appeal to the House, that of his own knowledge he could not condemn the decisions; that no case had been examined by him, which attached blame to the Commissioner, either of error or corruption. The facts then were narrowed to this; that no gentleman in favor of the resolution had any personal knowledge of them. I will only state one more fact, said Mr. J., and sit down. On my first arrival here, it was stated to me that the House in our view caught fire from the Capitol: I heard it often—I took the trouble to examine the evidence in this and another case, the only two I ever heard complained of before this day—and other gentlemen might, if they chose, have done the same, particularly members who introduce into this House solemn resolutions for suspending laws. I did look over the papers, and the fact was established by the testimony of the acting Secretary of War, and by other incontestable evidence, that the building had been occupied by a military force, and that the rockets of the enemy were, therefore, applied to it. For the honor of the House, for the reputation of the man, Mr. J. asked, would they, without examination, press forward resolutions deciding questions of the merits of which they were wholly ignorant?

Mr. FORSYTH said, the gentleman misunderstood him if he supposed he had offered and pressed this resolution without just grounds. He had, he said, to be sure, no personal knowledge of facts, but his resolution was bottomed on information received from the Heads of Department—and information received in this way was much more entitled to credit than information received from the Commissioner himself. The case of Mr. O'Neale was received from the chairman of one of the committees, who received it from the Head of the Navy Department—that case had been decided, and paid, without application to the Navy Office for evidence. He had no personal knowledge of facts, indeed, but he had enough to authorize him and the House to proceed as proposed.

Mr. HARDIN now rose to make the motion he had before contemplated, to lay this resolve on the table. He was pretty well satisfied with what had been said, and he presumed the House was satisfied, he said, of the incompetency of the officer, whom it was probable the President would see fit to remove.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, he hoped he understood the gentleman from Georgia correctly; that the resolution was founded on the suggestion of the Heads of Departments. If so, it appeared strange, indeed, he said, that the President should introduce this subject to the notice of Congress in one way, and his counsellors, indirectly, in another way.

Mr. FORSYTH explained. He hoped the gentleman would not misunderstand him purposely. He did not say that he had introduced the motion at the suggestion of any Head of a Department. It was on information from them; the suggestion was his own.

Mr. GROSVENOR thanked the gentleman for his information. The President had come forward and given the House his views of this subject. His Constitutional advisers, instead of giving him information, come in this way and lay information before the House! [Mr. FORSYTH said, that the information he had received, was sought by him.] The gentleman, Mr. G. said, had come forward to the House with rumors of misconduct in a public officer; which rumors, it appeared, originated with Executive officers—with the very authority to which it was now proposed to go for the purpose of correcting the alleged evil. This information comes from the advisers of the President of the United States, and yet it is impossible to presume they had laid it before the President, or he would not have confined his communications to the House to those which he had made. It was therefore proposed to this House to jogg the President, because the Heads of Departments had not chosen to do it. As it appeared that the President, his counsellors at least, had already full information on this subject, it was surely unnecessary for the House to pass this resolve.

The SPEAKER having requested gentlemen to confine their remarks to the question before the House—that of laying the subject on the table—The debate ceased.

The question on laying the resolve on the table was decided in the affirmative as follows: For laying it on the table 68, against it 64.

MONDAY, December 16.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on the memorial of William Haslett, made a report thereon, which was read: When Mr. YANCEY, reported a bill for the relief of William Haslett, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REYNOLDS, from the committee to whom was referred the letter, from the acting Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the commissioners appointed to survey and mark a road, from Tennessee, through the Chickasaw nation, reported a bill, making an appropriation for opening and cutting out a road therein described, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill for the relief of Luther Bingham, passed through the Committee of the Whole, and was ordered nem. con. to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill respecting a modification of the tonnage duty, reported the other day, by the Committee of Ways and Means, passed through the Committee of the Whole, without debate, and was ordered, nem. con. to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a motion to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act laying a duty on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, &c. Mr. S. briefly expressed his reasons to be, the injustice of the operation of this duty to enterprising men of business, from which capitalists and those best able to bear it were wholly exempt. The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, referring to a proposition of the same sort made at the last session, but then opposed by him as being unseasonably introduced, said that, since that time, the bank law had passed, the subscription had been filled under auspicious circumstances, and the bank was about to go into operation. Now he said, was a proper moment for the House to consider whether the course of internal improvement was a proper direction for the United States to give to their share of the profits of that institution. He therefore moved,

“That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of setting apart the bonus, and the net annual proceeds of the National Bank, as a permanent fund for internal improvement.”

Mr. C. said, it was not his object at this period to discuss the importance of national improvement. It was sufficient to say, that it was of such importance as to have been annually recommended to the attention of Congress by the Executive.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Commissioner of Claims.

H. OF R.

That it had not been heretofore acted on, was not to be attributed, Mr. C. said, to any impression derogating from the importance of the subject. It arose from the want of funds; from the embarrassed state of our finances, and from the critical state of our foreign relations, which demanded all our attention. We had now abundance of revenue, and were in a state of peace, giving leisure to Congress to examine subjects connected with domestic affairs—of all which, internal improvement was not exceeded in importance by any. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would pass, and the inquiry be made as proposed.

The motion was agreed to, nem. con., and Messrs. CALHOUN, SHEFFEY, CREIGHTON, GROSVENOR, and INGHAM, were appointed the committee.

TUESDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit: from New York, VICTORY BIRDSEYE, appeared and took his seat.

A new member also appeared, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN TYLER, in the room of John CLOPTON, deceased, who produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Engrossed bills, of the following titles, to wit:

An act for the relief of Luther Bingham.

An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imposts and tonnage, were severally read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria; which was twice read, and committed.

Some discussion took place on a motion made by Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, to clothe the Committee of Claims with power to call for persons and papers, with a view to obtaining from William O'Neale two papers, stated by Mr. HARDIN to be essential to a just view of the merits of his claim against the United States for a vessel destroyed; which papers were the property of the House, but accidentally delivered to him by the clerk with his own papers, which he had leave to withdraw from the files of the House. It was suggested, after some conversation, rather than debate, that this object could be accomplished without difficulty, on a mere request from the Clerk to Mr. O'Neale; and, in the end, Mr. HARDIN's motion was rejected.

PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following bill:

A Bill concerning the invalids of the Revolutionary war, and the widows and children of the militia, and the soldiers of the army during the late war.

Be it enacted, &c., That all laws and regulations authorizing the officers and soldiers of the regular army, and the officers and soldiers of the militia, who served during the late war, to be placed on the pension roll, shall, and they are hereby declared to, relate equally to the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war; and the officers and soldiers of the militia who served in the Indian war previous to the Treaty of Greenville.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or soldier of the militia, of the rangers, the sea-fencibles, the twelve and fifteen months volunteers, shall have died within three months after returning home from the service of the United States, by reason of wounds received, or diseases contracted, while in the service of the United States, and shall have left a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow or, if no widow, such child or children shall be entitled to, and receive half the monthly pay to which such officer or soldier was entitled at the time of his leaving the service aforesaid, for and during the term of five years. But, in case of death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the child or children of such deceased officer or soldier: Provided, also, That this provision shall extend to the widows and children of the officers of the regular army.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, if any soldier of the regular army, during the late war, shall have died while in the service of the United States, or upon his return home, by wounds received in that service, or by any other means; or if any such soldier shall have died within three months after his return home, by wounds received or diseases contracted, while in the service of the United States, and shall have left a widow, she shall be entitled to and receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, or at his discharge, for and during the term of five years; but, in the case of the death or intermarriage of such widow before the expiration of the term aforesaid, the half pay for the remainder of the five years shall cease and determine, and, in the cases embraced by this act, the five years shall commence from the death of the officer or soldier aforesaid.

The bill was twice read, and committed.

COMMISSIONER OF CLAIMS.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the Message of the President, recommending a revision of the act for the settlement of claims, for property lost and destroyed in military service during the war, handed in a report, stating the circumstances of three decisions, which, in the opinion of the committee, the Commissioner had incorrectly made under the law, and recommending to the House the adoption of the following bill:

A Bill to amend the act "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes, passed the 9th day of April, 1816."

Be it enacted, &c., That the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth, sections of the act "To authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes, passed the 9th day of April, 1816," be and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all claims, the payment for which is authorized and allowed, by the said act, shall hereafter be heard and decided by the Additional Accountant of the War Department, under such rules and regulations as have heretofore been established for the settlement of accounts in the said Department, and such other rules as the President of the United States may hereafter prescribe.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the loss or destruction of the property, mentioned in the aforesaid act, as well as the value thereof, shall be ascertained by the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit of, and which shall be in the power of the party to produce, and the amount thereof, when so ascertained, and the decision thereon approved by the Secretary of War, shall be paid to the sufferer or sufferers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report and bill were read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

To enable the committee to decide on the necessity of an alteration in any of the provisions of the act, it was necessary, first, to understand the construction which it had received from the Commissioner appointed to carry it into effect. For this purpose, the chairman of the committee, under their instructions, addressed a letter to Richard Bland Lee, Esq., requesting his attendance before them, to give them such information upon the subject of their inquiry as his experience under the act could afford. Mr. Lee accordingly attended, and, from a conversation with him generally upon the provisions of the act, the committee were decidedly of opinion that he had given, and was still disposed to give, to the law, an extension of construction not contemplated by Congress at the time of its passage, and not warranted by its object. Among the adjudications made by the Commissioner, there are several which have been examined by the committee, and in their opinion not authorized by the law. The first case to which their attention was called was the case of Daniel Carroll of Duddington, who, together with others, owned a house in the City of Washington, called Tomlinson's Hotel. A part of this house was occupied by two families on the evening of the 23d of August, 1814, at which time the remainder of the house, being unoccupied, was taken possession of by a troop of cavalry, and some militia from Virginia, on their way to join that part of the army commanded by General Winder, and then in the vicinity of the city. Some of the militia continued in possession of that part of the house, unoccupied by any family, until 11 or 12 o'clock on the 24th. On that evening the British army, commanded by General Ross, entered the city; and it is proved by some men who say they then belonged to the British army, that, in consequence of its appearing to the officers that troops had occupied the house, it was burnt. No other person who lived in the house or about it has proved the cause of its destruction. It is believed that, under a rigid and proper construction of the law, this claim ought not to have been allowed. The ninth section of the act authorizes payment for a house or building destroyed by the enemy while the same was occupied as a military deposite, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, if it shall appear that such occupation was the cause of its destruction. A mere temporary occupation of the house for one night and a part of the next day, by one or two companies of militia, cannot impart to the house even the character of barracks, much less that of a military deposite. It is not for the committee to decide upon this occasion upon the merits of Mr.

Carroll's claim, or of what would have been its fate upon an application to Congress; but they are fully persuaded that a sound construction of the act would not authorize its payment. The amount of the claim is $27,093 50; the most objectionable part of which is a charge for rent of the house from the 24th August, 1814, to the 24th August, 1816, at $3,200.

The second was the case of Tench Ringgold & Co. Mr. Ringgold, W. and C. Smith, and Philip B. Key, owned an extensive ropewalk, with a house on the same lot, and not far distant from the walk, in the City of Washington. It appears, from evidence filed with the Commissioner, that the owners of the ropewalk had been in the habit of manufacturing cordage for the Navy of the United States, upon contracts made with the Secretary of the Navy. In the year 1811, a cable belonging to the United States, then lying in the navy yard, had one of its strands accidentally cut by a carpenter; it was taken to the ropewalk to have it cut, and a new one put to each end. One end of the cable was afterwards, in the latter part of the year 1811, removed to the navy yard, and the other continued in or about the walks. On the 25th August, a British officer and a party of men went to the ropewalk, broke open one of the doors, and the officer ordered one of the men to set fire to some yarns which were stretched in the walks, and which the master workman states were to have been manufactured into cables for the Government. The person who had care of the ropewalks remonstrated against the conduct of the officer, and assured him that it was the property of a private citizen; to which he replied that he did not wish individuals to suffer, but that he should destroy all houses and property which were engaged in public work, and that he knew or believed the yarns in the ropewalks were intended for public use, and that the walks at that time were employed in public work. At the same time he ordered the house not far distant to be fired, but, upon examination, finding that it was occupied by the master workman of the walks, and not occupied as a storehouse, it was not fired at that time; while the walk, however, was burning, the house caught fire and was destroyed. The value of the ropewalk, and the property that was in it, and the house, amounting to $17,612 39, has been awarded to the owners, upon the ground that the ropewalk and house constituted a military deposite—an adjudication, in the opinion of the committee, most erroneous and improper.

Another decision which has been made by the Commissioner, the committee are of opinion is much more erroneous and improper than either of the two which have been mentioned: it is the case of William O'Neale and Robert Taylor. The evidence before the Commissioner, and which he has submitted to the committee, was the certificate of Solomon Frazier, stating that he was a lieutenant in the flotilla service under the command of Commodore Barney, and that, pursuant to the commander's orders to him, he ordered the schooner Islet, belonging to O'Neale and Taylor, to be sunk in the Patuxent, to prevent her falling into the possession of the enemy, on the 22d August, 1814—she then having on board property of the United States. The owners of this vessel are allowed $4,000, that being the valuation, according to affidavits filed with the Commissioner. According to the adjudication, this claim was allowed, under the third section of the act which authorizes payment for property only in those cases where the injury has been produced by capture, destruction, or loss, by the enemy.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. of R.

The case of O'Neale and Taylor was before the Committee of Claims the last session of Congress, and by them reported to the House of Representatives. That report, together with the evidence upon which it was made—except the official statement of Commodore Barney, which, according to the letter of the Secretary of the Navy of the 16th of December, 1816, is now in the possession of William O'Neale—is annexed to this report.

Considering the extended construction which has been given to the law, and the erroneous decisions made under it, the committee are of opinion that the act should be so amended as to repeal a part of its provisions, and transfer the settlement of claims under it to the War Department. They are the more induced to recommend this course, because the cases provided for will there be determined according to uniform principles observed in the settlement of claims under the control and responsibility of the Head of that Department, and will pass through the several offices in the usual way of transacting business, and subject to the usual checks known to be so salutary in the settlement of accounts. They therefore report a bill to that effect.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in the Chair.

The proposition made by Mr. PICKENS to recommend to the States an amendment to the Constitution, to establish an uniformity of the mode of election (by districts) in all the States, of Representatives to Congress and Electors of President and Vice President, was read.

Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, rose to support his proposition. In no other case can it be more important, he said, that the law should be fixed and uniform, than in the exercise of the right of suffrage. This is the only link between the people and their Government. To preserve this connexion, this right should not only be exercised in fact, but in such manner as to insure it confidence and respect. For this purpose, it would seem essential that the mode of election should be fair in relation to different parts; that it should be free from sudden changes; that it should be as direct a communication of the public will as conveniently might be, and in a manner the most pure.

If our system of Government is worthy of a fair trial, it must be an urgent duty on us to apply its fundamental powers so as to perform properly their several functions. The public will being the centre of motion, its influence must be properly imparted to the surrounding bodies, or the experiment will be unfair, and the system may become deranged; with this view, the present amendment to the Constitution has been offered.

Mr. P. said the proposition now before the Committee was so plain in itself, and had been so often brought into view in the different States, as well as before this body on several occasions, that he would only present a few leading ideas which induced him to hope for its adoption.

The resolution proposed to engraft no new principle into the Constitution; but to prescribe a mode of exercising one of the clearest and most valued rights which we hold under that instrument—a mode as old as the Government itself. At first, when intrigue and State struggling had not polluted our elections, it was the most general mode practised by most of the States, and is still continued by some of them. The objection, therefore, which is urged by some, that “the features of our Government should not be altered,” will not apply to the proposed amendment, inasmuch as it embraces no new feature, and fixes upon a uniform rule, rendering it unalterable by the varying views of the States and the changes of factions and times. The reason of the objection is one of the strongest arguments in favor of establishing a fixed rule for the exercise of our suffrages, which shall become venerable from long and unaltered usage, and on principles which will be equal and fair to all parties, to all parts of the country, and at all times.

Another objection I have heard to one branch of this amendment is, that Congress already possesses the power of regulating the elections of representatives. It is a sufficient answer to say that Congress never has yet ventured to touch the subject, so extremely delicate is it viewed. Indeed, Congress should never be allowed to touch it, unless to make such regulations as should be perpetual. The consequence of allowing this body to be changing the mode of exercising this fundamental right, would be viewed by some of the States with great jealousy, particularly where it might be construed as done with the view of gaining some unfair political advantage; and it might often happen that the jealousy would be too well founded. To avoid, therefore, all causes for future heart-burnings, in times when intrigue and faction shall prevail, would it not be prudent, at this season of serenity, when there is no particular contest in view, to establish, unalterably, such regulations as will be just and fair, and least liable to abuse?

Steadiness and uniformity in the mode of election of either the Representatives or the Electors, is only attainable by a Constitutional provision. While this is left to the varying views of Congress, and the still more various and varying councils of the several States, such changes will be made by the prevailing parties, for the time being, as may answer their particular views. Our own experience is ample to prove this. We have seen sometimes a general vote prescribed—districts of various sizes electing from one to three or four Representatives or Electors, and Legislatures have taken upon themselves the appointment of Electors. Thus have the people been kept in a state of fluctuation and uncertainty, about the most important right they possess, after enjoying it very equivocally and indirectly, if enjoyed at all. There have been exhibited between States and the parties in States, almost every four years, what might be called a political farce, but for the importance of the actors, and the weight of the results. The prevailing party in a State have generally been the advocates of State rights, and for giving a united suffrage, regardless of the sentiments of divisions, being a minority of the whole State. The minority in a State have contended for allowing to every section its proper and distinct weight, tending to divide the weight of suffrage. And this is the general character of the majority and minority, no matter of what political complexion.

We have seen the great State of Pennsylvania, though she generally acts with much regularity, at the point of losing her entire suffrage in the choice of Electors; the choice was then in the Legislature, and the two branches differing in political views, they were unable to agree on a ballot, until an actual compromise was effected, in which each side held out for the best terms it could procure. In this act the public voice was unheard.

About four years ago a similar case happened in Massachusetts, in which a compromise was agreed to, after many vain attempts to effect the choice, the two branches being opposed to each other.

About the same time, in New Jersey, a general vote of the people being the established mode for choosing Electors, and no change in the number of Electors, or other ostensible reason for an alteration existing, the Legislature convened a few days previous to the time of election; and finding a majority of that body of a different political complexion from what they supposed the majority of the qualified voters in the State to be, the election law was instantly repealed, and the right of appointing Electors was assumed by the Legislature, giving the Electoral College their own political image.

Mr. P. said he meant no reflection on these respectable States; the fault is in the system, or rather the want of system. These are a few only of the ridiculous and disgusting occurrences which ever have, and ever will attend this unsettled course; tending to degrade our representative Government in the eyes of the world, and to lower it in our own estimation.

We boast of our Government as an exception in the wisdom of its organization, as well as in the freedom of its institutions, and that it is not formed for the present day only, but for posterity. How can we reconcile this promising picture with the fact before us, that we cannot exercise one of the plainest acts under the Constitution, and one essential to its existence—the choice of a Chief Magistrate—without these struggles and intrigues among the members of the Confederacy, and between their component parts? No uniformity, no stability—maxims which we call fundamental, being often disregarded in practice, by which the people, the boasted fountain of power, have sometimes not even the semblance of suffrage, and often nothing but the semblance. The Electors, chosen by a Legislature, elected for a very different purpose, or by a general ticket, formed by a legislative or other caucus.

Would it not conduce more to the dignity and stability of the Government, to have its principal offices filled by a fair uniform procedure, which long habit would render venerable? Nothing tends more to give respect to any institution than long unaltered custom. This renders a bad Government more tolerable, and is the foundation of half the laws of every country in the world, our own not excepted. When to this regularity of method is added the qualities of being fair, pure, and congenial to our free professions, we can at least promise ourselves a fair trial of the theory of our Government.

These qualities all attend the mode proposed, in an eminent degree, with others which add to its worth. In elections by the people, in single districts, the candidates will be well known to the voters; they can best judge by their own knowledge who may be entitled to their confidence. The choice flows most directly from the people, who need no dictation from a caucus. The voter is not hampered by a general ticket of many names, some of whom he may not know, and others he may not like. The operation being confined to narrow limits, and the result being small, the public excitement cannot be great. The exercise of suffrage, originating with the people, it must be inaccessible to corruption. It is a maxim universally admitted, that the body of the people is honest, and free from intrigue. It would, indeed, be inconsistent to suppose that the people should feel an interest in injuring themselves; that they should be corruptible, would be absurd. Otherwise, in the case of a legislative choice, or caucus nomination. With all these properties, it has that of being perfectly convenient.

In every State there will be a diversity of sentiment, and often of interest. In this mode, each will have a fair hearing, where it amounts in importance to the majority of a district. In a general vote, any portion of sentiment less than a full majority of a State, will not be represented distinctly. The States of Georgia, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Vermont, all of which have chosen Representatives by general vote, in each of these there may be a diversity of opinion and of interest; this appears obvious from the majority being so equivocal in some of them, as to make entire changes in their delegation. It is presumable, that by the district plan there might be districts, having decided majorities differing from the prevailing sentiment of the State. And why should not these be heard in their due proportion? Difference of opinion is no crime. It arises mostly from difference of interest and of associations. If there be a district in Connecticut, having a majority of what is called Republican opinions; or a district in Georgia, of opposite sentiment, I should like, in either case, to see such districts represented here. Though there might be no great difference in the general momentum on either side, by this change, it would afford most happy consequences. Disappointment, in any measure, is then reconciled by the reflection that there was a fair trial. Kindred sympathies would be happily blended between distant climates, and geographical divisions avoided. The contrary is the consequence, in any larger mode of division, and especially in a general vote of States. Disappointment is then sharpened by considering that a fair trial was not had, that the sentiments of the minor divisions of the States were not heard. Antipathies would naturally become sectional between whole States and regions, being united in opposition to each other, respectively.

Of all species of division, none is so truly to be deprecated as that of a geographical character. And that the mode of general vote tends that way is clear, and that in filling the Electoral Colleges, as well as this House. For, the very appearance of this united opposition in colleges within whole States and regions, to other sections, equally united, and this frequently occurring, will naturally lead to the same kind of local feeling. And as certainly, too, in a federative system, where each State is left free to regulate its weight in the balance, does it tend toward the mode of entire suffrage; and our experience proves it. The evil, then, is a national one, and a growing one. Its only cure is by a Constitutional provision.

It is said that, by adopting this amendment in the case of Electors, the federative principle in that particular will be decreased. What is that federative principle? It consists mostly in the two extra Electors being allowed to the States without respect to their relative sizes; this was a concession to the small States. And this is still retained by the amendment, as there is no alteration in the distribution or number of Electors. The right of the States, indeed, to regulate the mode of appointment being of a federative character, may be an object with some. But when the State is so united in sentiment as to present an undivided front, it may still do so, and the object is still retained. When this is not the case, the loss in any State will depend on the relative losses sustained by other States in the same way, and the fraction of loss in any case is not worth the expense of the many evils resulting from the present unsettled course.

Mr. P. said he had long been impressed with the necessity of this amendment, and had for several successive sessions presented it; the favorable period, he hoped, had now arrived; it may be many years before we experience so much internal harmony. He had sincerely wished that his views had impressed some other member to have offered this proposition, whose influence and arguments could have given it force. He still hoped its own merits were such as to give it a favorable determination.

Mr. ROOR, of New York, said that changes in the constitutions of Governments ought never to be made on slight motives. Some great evil to be avoided, or some great good to be attained, ought to be the only motive to change. Attempts to change a constitution, even if unsuccessful, produced very pernicious effects; they are calculated to strip, in a degree, the Constitution of that reverence and respect to which it ought to be entitled, and which the rising generation ought to be taught to entertain for it. For these reasons, Mr. R. said, he never would consent to a change for slight causes.

The first proposition contained in the resolution before the House was not, he said, to his mind, calculated to change the principles of the Constitution, since it proposed nothing more than a modification of the manner in which a Constitutional provision should be executed. That the people should elect their Representatives, in such a manner as to speak the voice of the nation most distinctly, was what the Constitution intended. To so organize the House of Representatives that they may truly speak the national will, is to lay out the State into districts for electing Representatives; or the minority of the people may elect the majority of the Representatives. Mr. R. was therefore in favor of this part of the resolution.

But the other proposition, said he, as now presented to us, contemplates an invasion of one of the great fundamental principles of our Constitution. It was not so, as the honorable gentleman from North Carolina seemed to suppose, that the great States had yielded to the smaller ones (at the formation of the Constitution) two Senators each. It was the small States that yielded a full representation to the large States, in the popular branch, according to their numbers. Before the adoption of the Constitution each State, large or small, had an equal voice in Congress, as an independent State, confederated with others, on equal terms and with equal rights. But, the large States having to pay a share of the taxes in proportion to their numbers, the smaller States had conceded to the larger ones, that they should have a representation in one branch of the Legislature in proportion to their numbers. One branch of the Legislature, therefore, was representative, the other federative. The Executive branch of the Government was a compound of both—the people and the State sovereignties combining their powers to elect a President of the United States. Hence a small State, containing sixty thousand souls, was entitled to four Electors, while one of double the population had perhaps not five votes, because the Electors are chosen on a principle which is a compound of the popular and federative principles, one of which this proposition proposes to invade. Those Electors to be appointed to represent the people, Mr. R. said, he had no objection should be chosen by the people, and in the same districts as are laid out for the election of Representatives; but the other two in each State, who were to represent the State sovereignties, ought to continue to be chosen as the Legislature might direct. To establish a different mode, would be to invade the rights of the States; and it would, besides, be found extremely inconvenient, in practice, to adopt the rule proposed. New York, for instance, with twenty-seven districts for Representatives, would find it extremely inconvenient to lay out twenty-nine for Electors; and the change would, in other respects, be burdensome. But the inconvenience of the rule in practice was not an objection, by any means, of equal force with that growing out of its invasion of the principles of our Government, which was to him an insuperable obstacle to that part of the resolution.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, said that the resolution under consideration embraced two objects. The first part of it was intended to render the mode of electing the members of this House uniform throughout the United States; the other part was intended to produce a uniformity in the mode of choosing Electors of the President and Vice President of the United States. He was in favor of both parts of the resolution. He would, he said, however, premise that he had no objection to the modification of the resolution in the manner proposed by his colleague, (Mr. Root,) who had just resumed his seat.

With respect to the first part of the resolution, Mr. H. said, the States, immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, by their practice under it might be said to have expressed an opinion favorable to the proposed amendment. Most, if not all the States, immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, had been divided into districts, for the purpose of electing members in the House of Representatives of the United States, in the manner contemplated by the proposed amendment. The same system would probably have been continued to the present time, had it not been for the struggle between the two great parties which had for several years past divided this nation.

Mr. H. said that he could not perceive that any serious inconvenience could arise from engrafting this part of the resolution into the Constitution, while at least one important advantage would result from it.

If the Electors residing within a territory comprehending only thirty-five thousand inhabitants, vote for one man only within that territory, their means of personally knowing the political principles, talents, and morals of the candidate, would be far better than they could be where the members of Congress are chosen by general ticket, in a State containing a population equal to New Jersey or New Hampshire.

Mr. H. said, that, in his view, the principal value of the elective franchise consisted in this: that the Elector having in his eye several of his fellow-citizens, with whose moral characters and mental endowments he was well acquainted, would by his vote declare which of them he thought most worthy to be intrusted with his rights. As, therefore, by adopting the proposed amendment, the value of the elective franchise would be increased, and no serious evil would, in the opinion of Mr. H., result from it, he said he was decidedly in favor of that part of the resolution.

But, said Mr. H., I consider that part of the resolution which proposes so to alter the Constitution as to render the mode of choosing Electors for President and Vice President uniform throughout the United States, far the most important.

The practice in many of the States under the Constitution is, that the Electors for President are chosen by the members of the State Legislatures. This practice is, I think, inconsistent with the genius of our Government. The American Government is essentially a popular one. All power is declared to be derived from the people.

The voice of the people, constitutionally pronounced at the poll of an election, is the only sovereign and independent exercise of authority acknowledged in this nation.

And, sir, the further you remove an officer from a direct dependence for political existence on the voice of the people thus expressed, in that proportion you diminish the power and privileges of the citizen. If this doctrine be correct, it is then totally inconsistent with the general principles of our Government, that the elected should choose Electors. This machinery is unnecessary in ascertaining the will of the majority of the people on the great question, "who shall be their Chief Magistrate." It is inconsistent with that republican simplicity which ought to characterize the government of a free people. It is, sir, a machinery which, in the hands of bad men, may be used to thwart that very public will which, by an election, is supposed to be declared. The mode of choosing Electors by the people, by general ticket, as it was called, Mr. H. said was equally objectionable. Almost all the arguments which had been, or could be urged against choosing members of Congress by general ticket, applied with equal, if not stronger force, against choosing Presidential Electors in the same manner. In those States where Electors were chosen by general ticket, he believed it was universally the case that they were nominated by the members of the State Legislature. Sir, said Mr. H., according to the present laws of party, a nomination amounts to a choice.

But, said Mr. H., I contend that it is not right that the Legislatures of the respective States should have the power of determining the mode of choosing Electors for the President. The danger of a combination of great States to the prejudice of small ones, furnishes to my mind a strong objection to allowing to the respective State Legislatures the power of determining the mode of choosing Electors. One hundred and eleven votes will elect your President. The States of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, give one hundred and one votes. These four States therefore, connected with a comparatively small State, can elect a President. Thus a mere bald majority of one in the State Legislatures of five States can impose a President on the fourteen States, even if the inhabitants of the remaining fourteen States were to a man opposed to him. It is unnecessary to pursue this part of the subject further, because it must appear evident that, if the Constitution is not altered, the minority can and possibly, nay probably, will govern the majority. It may be objected against the proposed amendment, that if adopted it will diminish the influence of the great States. Be it so. I am willing, sir, that the influence of the great States in their corporate capacity in the election of a President should be diminished.

While I say this, I do not forget that I come from a great State. But, sir, when this question comes to be fairly submitted to the people of the State of New York, I have the fullest confidence that their patriotism will induce them to make a sacrifice of any advantage they may derive as a State under the present provisions in the Constitution, for the purpose of placing the union, independence, and liberties of the United States on a firmer basis. Sir, the question of who shall be elected President, is not a State, but a National question. The President is an officer who exists for the benefit of the people of the United States, and not for any one State or any part of the States. He ought not, therefore, to be created by the States, but by the people. The personal merit and political principles of the candidate are the only proper objects to which the attention of the Electors ought to be directed. A great State, therefore, cannot claim, because she is great, that she should furnish a Chief Magistrate for the nation. But so long as the Legislatures of the respective States choose or direct the mode of choosing the Electors, so long State claims, as they are called, will enter more or less into consideration in the selection of a President. But, sir, alter your Constitution, cause the Presidential Electors to come directly from the people, and they will bring with them the public sentiment, unbiassed and unadulterated. We shall then hear no more of State claims. The great mass of the people will pay homage to talent and political virtue—and whether the man who challenges their preference for these qualities is found on the heights of the Green Mountains, at the northern extremity of the Union, or on the banks of the Mississippi, to them it will be indifferent. Mr. H. said he had another objection against the choice of Electors being made by order of the State Legislatures. It was the danger arising from the influence of the Executive of the United States on the State Legislatures exerted for the purpose of continuing himself in office or of selecting his successor. In the few remarks I wish to offer to the Committee on this subject, said Mr. H., I protest against the inference that I intend any allusion to transactions in relation to any past Presidential election. It is not so. I mean to state what in my opinion will be the conduct of the Executive, taking man as he is. Sir, the person who will fill the Executive Chair will have his preferences. He will have views of his own in relation to the great question respecting the first office in the nation. He has a right to them—and his opinions are entitled to the same respect as those of any other individual possessed of equal experience and judgment. But he has no right to make use of the official patronage given him by the Constitution for other purposes, to aid him in carrying those views into effect. But, possessing an inclination like all other men, to carry into effect his own wishes, are we not to presume that he will call to his aid in accomplishing his views some of the patronage of which he finds himself possessed? He must be more than man not to do so. If then it be desirable that the free unbiassed judgment of a majority of the people of this nation, pronounced at the election, should determine the momentous question, Who shall be the First Magistrate? everything which tends to give one citizen an undue influence over the opinions of other citizens, ought to be guarded against—ought to be resisted. And sir, can it for a moment be doubted but that the State Legislatures present bodies of men on whom the Executive influence can be brought to bear with more effect than on the whole mass of the American people? I think not.

Amendment to the Constitution.

A practice, said Mr. H., has been resorted to, and will probably be resorted to again; a practice which, on this occasion, I beg leave to mention, without either censure or approbation, of designating the Presidential candidate in a Congressional caucus. Putting for a moment out of view Executive patronage, surely no one will deny but that the political friends of the Executive, after a residence for some time in his immediate neighborhood, will, at such meetings, be greatly influenced by the known wishes and views of the Executive. And, sir, when you add to the influence which political partialities and court blandishments will necessarily have on the minds of the best of men, that influence which is produced by the power to dispose of all offices of honor and profit, it is not to be presumed that a majority of the political friends of the Executive will ever be found who will designate a candidate in opposition to his wishes. The moment the designation is made, the minority in such caucuses will, from a respect to the great political party to which they are attached, and from at least an implied honorary engagement, be disposed to give their support to the Executive favorite. Thus the personal influence of the members of both Houses of Congress is brought to bear, in conjunction with Executive influence, on the State Legislatures.

Can Electors chosen by the State Legislatures under such circumstances be presumed to pronounce the wishes of the majority of the people? No sir, they will be a species of machinery got up to respond the will of the Executive, and not men who announce to the nation the voice of the people. It will be, as an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in some animadversions which he made during the last session on this mode of choosing Electors, said, with an energy and strength of language peculiar to himself "the shadow of a shade" of an election.

Sir, the power of the States to choose, or direct the manner of choosing Electors for the President, is a rotten, a gangrenous part of our Constitution, which if not removed will infect and poison the body politic. I hope it will be extirpated.

If this in fact be a Government founded on the opinions of a majority of the people, if in truth the people are not their own worst enemies, let your Electors be created immediately by, and come directly from, the people. When you do that, and not till then, you will be certain that your President holds his office by the consent and at the request of a majority of the people over whom he presides.

Mr. JEWETT, of Vermont, proposed a division of the question, so as to take the sense separately on the two parts of the resolution; as some gentlemen would be inclined to vote for one who would not vote for the other.

Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, said, that for his own part he had not given this subject that attention which it merited, and was not prepared to vote on it at this moment. The views which had been presented by gentlemen who had spoken were impressive, and had excited his reflection. Still he was not convinced, until he had further opportunity for consideration; that the mode proposed by the resolve was the best possible that could be adopted. Mr. R. said he was not satisfied, if an amendment in regard to the mode of choosing Electors was necessary, that one greatly preferable to that now before the House might not be adopted. [When the Constitution had been originally framed, it had been supposed, he said, that the members of the Electoral Colleges would get together, and consult as to the best person upon whom to bestow their votes; but the practice under the Constitution had shown this expectation to be idle, and that the election did not in fact turn upon the principle on which the Convention had intended to fix it. On the contrary, the Presidential candidates were fixed and announced before the election of Electors. Mr. R. thought the mode of election ought to be changed, but doubted whether the mode proposed would be the best. Might not the election, he asked, be better trusted at once to the people? Why the intervention of Electors? Surely the whole body of the people would be less subject to bribery or corruption than any smaller body. It did appear to his mind, as at present impressed, that to the people, and to them only, could the election be safely confided; and that all the present machinery, for electing a President, which sometimes is wielded by mere legerdemain, corruption, or unfair influence, be put out of the way.] This power would be no longer dangerous when confined to the people themselves. As to the mode of electing Representatives, Mr. R. did not see any great objection to it; but to attain the gentleman's object completely, the choice should be restricted to the district by which an individual is chosen. The feature, however, might be added by an amendment to the resolution. Not having, he said, made up his mind on this subject, and presuming that a number of the Committee were in the same situation, and considering the great importance of the subject on which they were about to act, he moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. CALHOUN, in acceding to this motion, took the opportunity to observe that he considered this a question of great importance. He thought the proposed amendment to the Constitution, if adopted, would remove some evils which experience has shown to exist, and which in future time, if uncorrected, may menace the existence of the Republic. He therefore thought this subject entitled to the most mature consideration.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, December 18.

Mr. PICKERING presented a petition of the representatives of the yearly meeting of the religious Society of Friends, held in Baltimore, praying that other and stronger provisions may be enacted to prevent the traffic in negro slaves from one State to another, within the United States, in which traffic they allege that many persons of color, free, or entitled to freedom at a given time, are carried into perpetual slavery.—Referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the African slave trade.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Henry Malcolm; and a bill to discharge from his imprisonment John Ricaud, late a paymaster in the army; which were severally twice read, and committed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Ohio, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President to appoint Commissioners to locate and mark out the road from the Ohio river, opposite to Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, through the State of Ohio, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution having been amended on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, so as to refer the subject to the standing Committee on Roads and Canals, was agreed to.

COMPENSATION LAW.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the subject, submitted a report relative to the compensation of the members of Congress, embracing an elaborate and ample view of the subject, accompanied by a bill to repeal the present compensation law, and in lieu thereof to provide a daily allowance of — dollars, and — dollars for every twenty miles travelling to and from the Seat of Government.

The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the consideration of the expediency of repealing or modifying the law passed at the last session, relative to the compensation of members of Congress, ask leave to report.

The power, vested in Congress by the Constitution, of providing for the pay of its own members, is, doubtless, a delicate trust; and it might have been apprehended, as well from the nature of the subject, as from former experience, that the most judicious exercise of that trust would not be exempt from some degree of public animadversion. The committee, however, cannot perceive, either in the increase of compensation provided by the late act, or in the mode of making that compensation, cause of excitement or alarm, adequate to the effects which are understood to have been produced. The addition which this law has made to the public expenditure is not considerable; and if it had been created by other measures of Government, would not, probably, of itself, have been thought worthy of great attention. And the change in the mode of compensation, even if it be not attended with real and manifest advantage, does not still appear to be wrong, so clearly, and in such dangerous measure, as to furnish grounds for any high degree of public inquietude. The committee, therefore, cannot but be of opinion, that the law in question has not been considered without some mixture of misapprehension of its principles and objects, and that a more accurate knowledge of its provisions, and more mature reflection on its design and tendency, if they should not end in a conviction of its usefulness, would yet result in a different and far more moderate estimate of its probable evils. It would not become the committee to claim any infallibility for the body of which they are members, nor to take it for granted, that every law which it may pass, must, necessarily, be a wise and wholesome act of legislation. Human errors and imperfections find their way into all bodies. And there is, doubtless, existing in the judgment of the community, a power under whose revision this and other acts of Government must and ought to pass. If, however, on a review of this subject, the House should still be of opinion, that the law in question, or some equivalent provision, has become essentially necessary for the useful exercise of the powers of Government, and for the safety, security, and honor of the people themselves, its members may still hope, that in not hastily departing from it, they will be justified by the enlightened sense and generous sentiments of the nation. The abandonment of a measure, which, accordingly to their most conscientious conviction, is intimately connected with the general good, would be no means of obtaining favor with the American people.

If, in passing the law in question, the House of Representatives discharged any portion of its duty, it acted upon general and public principles, with an entire disregard to the convenience of its own members, any further than their convenience was supposed to be connected with the public service. It treated the question, not as one between them and the public, but as exclusively of public and national concern. It regarded it as a subject of general policy, by which the nation, and the nation only, was to be affected; as much so as any other act of legislation whatever. Any imputation, so gross as to impeach its conduct in this essential particular, a feeling of self-respect must compel the House to pass over in silence, and its members must rely on their known character, as members of the Government, and as citizens of the community, to disprove it. The House would not presume to judge whether its services, in the various and important matters upon which it has acted, have deserved any consideration or respect from the public; but for those services, such as they are, it has not sought, nor would accept, any reward which could be measured out to it in a mere pecuniary compensation. And while the members of the House would certainly not think of claiming any merit for passing the law in question, any more than for the discharge of what they thought their duty in any other case, the committee do not see that they have any cause for taking humiliation upon themselves, on account of having passed an act which they believed would be essentially useful to the country, but which they must have foreseen would be exposed, itself, and might expose its authors, to misapprehension and misrepresentation of all sorts. Holding offices in the immediate gift of the people, of short duration, and at a time when the people were soon to exercise, in most districts, their accustomed privilege of a new election, if these offices had been objects of their regard, and if they had permitted personal considerations to influence their conduct, it is obvious that all such considerations pointed to a course different from that which they pursued. They must have known, that no measure could be more easily misconstrued and perverted to the purposes of obloquy and reproach. The committee cannot yet believe that a faithful discharge of duty, in the face of these probable consequences, is to be reckoned among dangerous political errors.

At the commencement of this Government, it was of course among its first measures to fix, by law, agreeably to the requisition of the Constitution, the pay of members of Congress. In the old Congress under the Confederation, the members were paid, not out of the national Treasury, but, by the States which they represented. The rates of compensation were different in different States; some States paid to their delegates eight dollars a day; others six; others less; and one State at least paid them by annual provision six hundred pounds sterling. It was natural to recur to these precedents, when the subject was taken up by the first Congress, under this Constitution. Taking as a just and obvious standard, by which to regulate the amount of compensation, the average of the rates which had been paid, by the different States, to their Delegates in the old Congress, it was found that such average amounted to somewhat more than six dollars a day. The compensation was accordingly fixed at six dollars a day, by the law of 1789.

As it was foreseen, that the depreciation of money, or the increased expense of living, might render this provision adequate, the law was limited in its duration, in order that it might be considered and altered, if necessary, at a future period. The subject was again brought before Congress, in 1795, by the expiration of the former law. On this occasion, as the committee have learned, and indeed as some of them remember, there was much diversity of opinion in the House of Representatives; some members wished, then, to change the mode from a daily sum to an annual allowance; others preferred to retain the existing mode, but to increase the sum; and a committee of the House reported in favor of increasing the daily pay to eight dollars, assigning for reason, a proportionate increase in the price of all commodities, and the expense of living, since the passage of the act. Those who opposed this augmentation, admitted it would be reasonable, if the price of commodities and the expense of living should keep up; but they hoped the rise would be temporary, and that money would soon resume, in relation to the expense of living, its former value. The proposition to increase the pay was lost by one or two votes only, and a law passed establishing the former rate.

The state of things existing in the Government and in the country, from 1796 to the close of the late war, furnish obvious reasons to account for the circumstance that, during that period, no attempt was made to raise the pay of members of Congress. In the mean time, the Seat of Government had been transferred to the City of Washington, and the expense of living, instead of returning to its former rate, as was expected by some, has gone on increasing progressively, until money, in relation the means of life, does not retain more than half its former value. In other words, if six dollars a day was no more than a reasonable provision, in the cities of Philadelphia and New York, eight-and-twenty years ago, twelve dollars would not be more than a reasonable and equal provision in the City of Washington, at the present time. Forty years ago, as has been stated above, some of the States paid their Delegates in Congress, eight dollars a day; and yet it never was supposed, during the Revolution, or afterwards, that the people of the United States had made unreasonable or exorbitant provision for their public agents. But, unless the early history of the country was marked by great extravagance in this particular, the rate of six dollars a day, fixed by the law of the first Congress, was no more than a moderate and necessary allowance at that time, because it was no more than the average of what all the States had found it necessary to pay to their respective delegates during the Revolution.

The only question then, is, whether there has been in truth such a change in the country, in the value of money and the expense of living, as to render that provision which was no more than sufficient in 1789, insufficient in 1816. It is a truth, plain to all whose experience or information enables them to judge, that so great has been the change in the foregoing particulars, which eight and twenty years have produced, that it is not incorrect to estimate the expenditures necessarily attached to a seat in Congress at twice their former amount. This change has not been confined to the condition of members of Congress. It has extended all over the country, and as well the National Government as every State government has been obliged to provide for it in a proportionate increase in the salaries of their public officers.

The Statute Book of this Government exhibits a constant and progressive increase of compensation in all the Departments of the Government, with the exception of the Legislature and the Supreme Judiciary. On the recommendation of the Executive, or its branches, the Legislature has repeatedly augmented the provisions for that Department, patiently raising the pay of the clerks and of writers far above that of its own members, without agitating either itself or the country with any question about its own compensation. From the Heads of the Departments to the lowest clerkships in the public offices, a general augmentation has obtained throughout. A long enumeration of instances is not necessary. One may suffice. When members of Congress were first paid six dollars a day, the salary of the Attorney General was one thousand five hundred dollars a year. This salary has since been increased to three thousand dollars; and the Executive has, at the present session, found it necessary to recommend a still further increase, as essential to the public service. If the duties of that officer have increased, so have the duties of members of Congress in at least an equal proportion; and which of the two stations requires the greatest sacrifice of private pursuits may be easily discerned.

At the time of passing the late act, it was found upon inquiry that from the organization of the Government to the commencement of the thirteenth Congress, (1813,) Congress had, on an average of all the years, been in session one hundred and fifty-nine days in a year. For eight years, ending with the thirteenth Congress, (1813,) it had been in session, on an average, one hundred and sixty-five days in each year. An easy computation will show that, supposing Congress to sit hereafter as many days within the year as it has usually done heretofore, the present amount of compensation, including travel and attendance, will exceed the amount received for travel and attendance under the former law, thirty-eight per centum. After the lapse of eight-and-twenty years, then, Congress has, for the first time, increased the pay of its members. It has increased it about one-third, and no more; although, within the same period, it has been called upon to raise, and has raised, the compensation of nearly all other officers of Government in a far greater proportion.

This enhancement of other compensations is not adverted to for the purpose of showing that Congress has been as favorable to others as to itself, or that it has made itself the latest object of its own bounty. In neither case has it supposed itself to be bestowing bounty or conferring favor. It has sought only to make such provisions as the public interest demanded. But the circumstance is referred to as furnishing evidence of the necessity of the late law, by showing that a similar necessity had been found to exist in other cases; and that by that law, Congress had done nothing for its own members which Executive recommendation, and its own opinion of propriety, with the general concurrence of public sentiment, had not compelled it to do at an earlier period, and in ample measure, for other officers of Government.

The State Legislatures, from the same necessity of complying with the change of circumstances, have made corresponding changes in the salaries of the officers of their governments; and it may not be inapplicable to recent occurrences to remark, that the members of these Legislatures have, in almost every State, increased, in many doubled, in some trebled, their own pay, during the period in which the compensation to members of Congress has remained at its original rate. As far, also, as the committee can learn, this increase of pay to members of State Legislatures has, in every instance, taken place in the same session in which it was voted.

Objections have been made to the manner of compensation introduced by the law of the last session. It has been said to have created salaries. If by this it is intended that the law allows to every member a defined and certain sum, without any deduction for absence or omission of duty, it is not a correct representation. Such deductions are provided for by the law, as completely as under the former mode. It has already been observed, that a difference of opinion has long existed on this point, and it still exists. When the law of 1796 was passed, there were those who thought it advisable to change the mode then in practice, and to adopt the example of an annual allowance, which had been formerly set by a very respectable State. There have been and still are those who are not without fear that an augmentation of the daily pay, if it should not in fact tend in some cases to the protraction of the session, might produce an evil of equal magnitude, by subjecting the Legislature to such an imputation.

Nor is it at all true, that the inconvenience of attending a session of Congress is always in proportion to its length. The season of the year in which the session is holden may be as material as its duration. The length of the journey to the Seat of Government is the same in both cases; and both cases require an entire breaking off of all private engagements, and an exclusive devotion to public business. It may be added, also, that while the compensation was computed by the day, as the sessions would naturally be longest in times of war, the greatest expense would fall on the Treasury, when it could bear it with the least convenience. Thinking, however, that the measure of augmenting the compensation was itself a necessary one, and that the form, if not the best, was a fair subject of experiment, the House did not forbear to adopt it, from difference of opinion in regard to the manner. It passed the law in its present form, in the hope that good would result from the change of mode, and with the knowledge that if such should not be the consequence, the former mode could be easily, and at any time, again adopted.

Compensation Law.

H. of R.

There now remain other topics connected with this subject, which the committee would submit to the consideration of the House.

Of all the powers with which the people have invested the Government, that of legislation is undoubtedly the chief. In addition to its own important, ordinary duties, the Legislature is the only power which can create other powers. Departments, with all their duties and offices—with all their emoluments—can emanate from the Legislature alone. Over the most numerous branch of the Legislature, therefore, the people have retained the power of frequent elections; and with this branch alone they have trusted the original exercise of the right of taxation. The members of the House of Representatives are the special delegates and agents of the people in this high trust. They, and they alone, proceed immediately from the suffrage of the people. They, and they alone, can touch the main-spring of the public prosperity. They are elected to be the guardians of the public rights and liberties. Can the people, then, have any greater or clearer interest, than that the seats of these their Representatives should be honorable and independent stations, in order that they may have the power of filling them with able and independent men? Is it according to the principles of our Government, that the legislative office should sink in character and importance below any office, even the highest, in the gift of the Executive? Or, can anything be more unpropitious to the success of a free, representative Government, than that the Representatives of the people should estimate anything higher than their own seats, or should find inducements to look to any other favor than the favor of their constituents?

It would be a most unnatural state of things, in a Republic, if the people should place greater reliance anywhere else than in their own immediate Representatives; or if, on the other hand, Representatives should revolve round any other centre than the interests of their constituents. Through their Representatives, the direct influence and control of the people can alone be felt. In them the rays of their power are collected; and there can be no better criterion by which to judge of the real influence of the people in the Government, than by the degree of respectability and importance attached to the representative character. Evil indeed to the public will that time be, should it ever arrive, when Representatives in Congress, instead of being agents of the people to exercise an influence in government, should become instruments of government to influence the people.

It is probably the necessary tendency of Government, that patronage and influence should accumulate wherever the Executive power is deposited; and this accumulation may be expected to increase with the progress of the Government, and the increasing wealth of the nation. To guard as far as possible against the effect of this on the Legislature, the Constitution has prohibited members of Congress from holding, while members, any office under Executive appointment; but it has not restrained them from resigning their seats to accept such appointments, nor from accepting them after their term of service has expired; nor has it prohibited the grant of such offices to their relations, connexions, or dependents. There are hundreds of offices in the gift of the Executive, which, as far as pecuniary emolument is concerned, are preferable to seats in Congress; indeed there are none, except of the very lowest class, which in that respect are not preferable.

Is it for the interest of the people that their Representatives should be placed in this condition? Is it expedient that better service should be commanded for any other department than for the hall of legislation? Or, admitting that offices of high trust and responsibility in the State, such as will be commonly regarded less from motives of pecuniary emolument, than from the love of honorable distinction and devotion to the public service, should possess more attractions than the legislative office, is it still fit or expedient that subordinate places in Government, such as have no recommendation but the salaries and perquisites belonging to them, should have the same influence?

And yet, not only is it well known that persons, at every election, decline being candidates for the Legislature, but the Government has not been without instances in which members of either House have relinquished their seats in the Congress of the United States to accept offices of a very low grade. Can the public interest require the establishment of a habit of filling such places by candidates taken from the legislative body? Or what is the value to the people, of the right of representation, if they have nothing to give which their Representatives will not relinquish for even the smallest appointments of the Executive power? It cannot but tend more, one would think, to the permanent safety of the Republic, that no such hopes or motives should exist; that there should be no inducements of this nature, either to an unfaithful and compliant discharge of official duty, or to a more indirect but not less pernicious exercise of the influence of a public character and a public station.

The geographical extent of the United States furnishes a case out of all analogy with anything which has heretofore existed either in any State government, or the Government of any other country. There are members of Congress who reside more than a thousand miles from the Seat of Government—a great proportion live at more than half that distance. If these members are accompanied by their families to a session of Congress, even the present compensation, with the strictest economy, does not defray their expenses. To live within the means provided for them, they must come as exiles from their own homes; they must abandon not only all private pursuits, but the enjoyment of all domestic relations, and live like strangers and temporary lodgers in the Metropolis of their own country. How far it is wise in Government to demand of those who enter its service this sacrifice of all social feelings, those who have the deepest knowledge of our nature are most competent to judge. It is a sacrifice which will not, ordinarily, and for any length of time, be made, by such as have the dearest and strongest ties to their country, and the greatest possible stake in its prosperity.

One further observation is obvious. If an adequate provision be not made for members of Congress, the office will fall, exclusively, into the hands of one or the other of two descriptions of persons; either of the most affluent of the country only, who can bear the charges of it without any compensation; or of those who would accept it, not for the compensation legally belonging to it, but from the hope of turning it to account by other means. A reasonable allowance, neither extravagant on the one hand, nor parsimonious on the other, would seem to be the best security against these various evils. Influenced by these considerations, Congress was, at the last session, of opinion that the compensation to members had become inadequate. The committee are still of the same opinion. In many cases it was not equal to the expense incurred by individuals in their attendance on the Legislature; and in all cases it must be presumed that the labor and intelligence bestowed on the discharge of his official duties, by an able and faithful member of Congress, could not but yield a much more profitable result if employed in private pursuits.

If the view which the committee have taken of this subject, be not altogether an erroneous one; if great changes, in relation to the value of money, and the price of living, have taken place in the country; if it has been found necessary to provide for this change by an increase of the compensation of other officers throughout the General and State Governments; and more than all, if it be desirable to maintain the Constitutional importance of the legislative office; to open to the people a wide field for the selection of Representatives; to put at their command the best talents in their respective districts; and to enable them to retain the services of those whose knowledge and experience have best fitted them to promote their interests and maintain their rights; then the object of the law in question was not only a useful, but a highly important and commendable object.

In regard to the mode of accomplishing that object, it has not been and is not easy to reconcile opinions. On the whole, the committee are of opinion that, under all the circumstances, it is advisable to provide that the increase of pay should be made in the form of an addition to the former daily allowance. They, therefore, recommend, that in lieu of all other compensations, there be paid to members of Congress and Delegates of Territories, — dollars per day for their actual attendance, and — dollars for every twenty miles travel to and from the Seat of Government. And they report a bill for that purpose.

A Bill allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to Delegates of Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject, contrary thereto.

Be it enacted, &c., That during the remaining part of the present session of Congress, to be calculated from the time of passing this act, and at every future session of Congress, and at every meeting of the Senate, in the recess of Congress, each Senator shall be entitled to receive, in lieu of all other compensation heretofore allowed by law, — dollars, for every day he shall attend the Senate; and shall also be allowed, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting — dollars, for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; and in case any member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness, on his journey to or from any session or meeting, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance; and the President of the Senate, pro tempore, when the office of the Vice President of the United States, is or shall be vacant, shall, during the period of his services, be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a member of the Senate, — dollars, for every day he shall attend the Senate. Provided, That no Senator shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of — dollars a day, from the end of one such session or meeting, to the time of his taking a seat in another.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That during the remaining part of the present session of Congress, to be calculated from the time of passing this act, and at every future session of Congress, each Representative, and each Delegate from the respective Territories, shall be entitled, in lieu of all other compensation heretofore allowed by law, — dollars, for every day they shall attend the House of Representatives; and shall be allowed, at the commencement and end of each session, — dollars, for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; and in case any Representative or Delegate shall be detained by sickness, on his journey to and from the session, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the House of Representatives, he shall be entitled to the daily allowance aforesaid; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a Representative, — dollars, for every day he shall attend the House: Provided always, That no Representative or Delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of — dollars a day, from the end of one session, to the time of his taking a seat in another. That the said compensation to the members of the Senate shall be certified by the President, and that which shall be due to the members of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegates, shall be certified by the Speaker; and the same shall be passed as public accounts, and paid out of the public Treasury. And that all acts, or parts of acts, contrary to the provisions of this act, be and the same are hereby repealed.

The report and bill having been read—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved that the bill be made the order of the day for the second Monday in January. His reason for moving so distant a day was, to give time to many members to arrive, who had not yet reached here, and to avoid having the subject discussed during the holidays, when the House was usually thin from the absence allowed to members.

Mr. H. NELSON, of Virginia, objected to so distant a day, and moved that the bill be made the order for to-morrow.

A short debate arose on the propriety of selecting an early or distant day.

Mr. NELSON's motion was advocated by himself and Mr. BARBOUR, on the ground that the subject had been so much agitated and so fully discussed, that it was already well understood, and further time for its consideration was unnecessary; that the measure was carried through rapidly at the last session, and as it required no more time to repeal a law than to make it, further delay was useless.

The motion, made by Mr. NELSON, was opposed by Messrs. GROSVENOR, CALHOUN, ROBERTSON, and PICKERING, who were in favor of a more distant day, because, between this time and January the House would be less full; and that, viewing the subject as one of uncommon importance, one which was perhaps connected with the future liberties of the country, a proper time for deliberation was necessary; that, as the House had been accused of acting rashly in passing the existing law, they might be as properly reproached with cowardice by a hasty and precipitate retraction, &c.

Mr. HULBERT said he earnestly hoped that the motion of his honorable friend (for assigning a distant day for consideration) would prevail. He lamented the precipitation with which the question respecting this law had been brought forward. Scarcely, said he, had the doors of Congress been thrown open, at the commencement of the session, when motions were made, in both Houses, for the repeal of the act. Why this extraordinary haste? Was there no other business worthy of the attention of Congress? Whence this impatience to undo that which we have so lately done? A few months ago, said he, after long discussion, and mature deliberation, we passed this law. Does it comport with the dignity of the House, is it consistent with a proper degree of self respect, thus to hasten its repeal? He dreaded the imputation of acting under the influence of fear, or of a love of popularity, and he was sure the manner in which they were proceeding could not fail to bring upon them that odious charge. He had flattered himself that this subject would be left to the disposal of the next Congress. We, said he, have declared our opinions, and have given our votes accordingly. If those who shall come after us, who have been elected since the passage of this law, should be of a different opinion, they can reverse what we have done. But why should we be the censurers of our own conduct? Why thus pass sentence of condemnation upon ourselves? Admitting that this business is not to be referred to the next Congress, but is to be settled by ourselves, why should we be called upon instantly to act upon the long, the very able, and important report, which is before us? It is said that the voice of the people demands an immediate attention to the subject. He denied the fact. He said the voice of the people had not been heard. It was the clamor of newspapers; it was the voice of party spirit, of faction, and misrepresentation, which had been heard. The deliberate opinion of the people he would always highly respect. But the clamors of faction he would despise.

Mr. H. said he had freely given his vote for the law in question. He thought it a correct, just, and necessary measure. He had again, and again reviewed the subject; and he was certainly satisfied with what he had done. Until he could change his opinion, he would never change his vote. His constituents, he said, might impute to him want of wisdom; but they should never justly charge him with abandonment of his principles, with cowardly and poltroon conduct.

Mr. GASTON conceiving that the honor of the House required that they should on the one hand avoid unnecessary delay, and on the other an unbecoming precipitancy, moved that the bill be made the order for the first Monday of January.

The question being first taken on Mr. JOHNSON'S motion for the second Monday, was carried by a large majority.

THE EPERVIER.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the settlement of the accounts of the officers and crew of the United States' brig Epervier, supposed to have been lost at sea.

Mr. TAYLOR remarked, on this motion, that all must recollect with what anxiety the arrival of this vessel had been expected and hoped for, on her return with despatches from the Mediterranean. From the lapse of time since that period, the last ray of hope glimmering in the bosoms of the friends of the officers and crew of that vessel had become extinct, and the persons on board had been now long given up for lost. Among them there was a young man of the name of Melancthon W. Bostwick, who was Purser on board the vessel. On the breaking out of the late war, said Mr. T., he felt a disposition to signalize himself in the service of his country. He entered the naval service a volunteer, and was placed on board the frigate Essex. In the various instances in which that frigate distinguished herself, Bostwick bore a distinguished part. Without the aid of friends or patronage, by his good conduct on every occasion, he soon attracted the attention of the very distinguished commander of that vessel. After the capture of the Essex, he was, on his return home, recommended and appointed a Purser in the United States' service. There was committed to his charge money for recruiting for the Epervier, and he was distinguished by the accuracy and attention with which he discharged the duties of his appointment. His papers, his money, and all his accounts, Mr. T. said, were at the bottom of the ocean. It was due to the feelings of his friends and connexions, that their regret at his loss should not be increased by his being placed on the books of the Department as a defaulter, on account of the disaster which destroyed at the same time his life and his accounts. It was not necessary, Mr. T. added, to say anything on the subject of extra allowance to the heirs of those who had thus perished, as that subject would present itself to the Naval Committee. But, at any rate, it was fit that some provision should be made for the adjustment of the accounts of the deceased, which could not be settled at the Navy Department, without the interference of the Legislature.

The resolve was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take into consideration his proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, addressed the Chair. He commenced his observations by referring to the ample scope of the remarks made yesterday by the worthy gentleman who introduced this proposition, and remarking on the advantage of the House resolving itself into a Committee of the Whole, as affording a greater latitude to debate.

There was, he said, on this question, important as on all hands it was allowed to be, a degree of apathy and nonchalance, which would strike any one ignorant of the character of the American people, and of the nature of our institutions, with great surprise. Fortunately, he said, we are not a people prone to change; and there was not any gentleman, however respectable his character, however specious his proposition on the face of it, could catch attention in any of our legislative bodies, unless there was a decided conviction of the expediency of adopting his views. To this proposition Mr. R. said he was opposed in toto, and would deliver his principal reasons as succinctly as he could.

It was not necessary, he said, to remind the House, that from the commencement of the Federal Government the people of the United States had been divided into two great hostile parties. Although individuals had changed, the presumption was that the parties remained pretty much the same at the present day—although deserters came and went from the one to the other, as suited their interests or their views of political advancement, the principles of the parties were not much changed. One of the great leading causes of the division of the American people was the greater or less regard they were disposed to show to the powers of the States. It had been often said before on this floor, but perhaps it might not be amiss again to state it, that the difference between the two great parties consisted, on the one hand, of a devotion to the General, in opposition to the State Governments, and in the distribution of the powers of the Government, of a leaning, a bias, an attachment to the Executive branch of the Government—to that branch more remote from, and apparently independent of, the people than this House. I, said Mr. R., was brought up in the school, and have never yet been expelled from it, which upheld the rights of the States in opposition to the rights of this masked monarchy—for such our Government is; of the rights of the popular branch of the Government, in opposition to the other branches of the Government, in all cases (be it remarked) of doubtful construction.

Mr. R. said, then, he was opposed to this resolution for the simple reason that it contemplated an abridgment of the powers of the States—that was enough for him. He was not one of those, he said, who made new and great discoveries in politics, such as that the powers of the States were too great and ought to be diminished. If there were no other objection to this proposition, it would be sufficient for him that it went to abridge the powers of the States. It was in vain for honorable gentlemen to tell him that, in the case referred to in this resolution, the States did not exercise their existing powers as they ought. With that, under favor and under correction of the Chair, this House had nothing to do. It is no business of ours, said he, how the States exercise their powers. It is an affair of their own, possibly between the State Legislatures and their constituents, but not between them and us. I have, said Mr. R., an indisposition to change in Government—nolo leges mutare; would to God I could once see a Legislature here or in the States which would leave things as they found them, and adjourn. This pruriency of legislation will, in my humble opinion, sooner or later prove the bane and work the destruction of the Confederacy. When I say, continued Mr. R., that I am against the proposition of the gentleman, I hope that neither he nor any other gentleman will suppose I am friendly to the manner in which their Constitutional power has been exercised by the State of which I am a member and Representative in regard to the election of Electors. I am not. I know that at this moment it is a mockery of election. I feel aggrieved in my own person as one of the freeholders of that Commonwealth, that envied Commonwealth; but for that grievance I will never come to this House for redress; I had much rather see the grievance doubled, than that this House should dare to think itself competent to interfere between the Legislature and the people of Virginia. He knew, he said, that the election of Electors in that State was a mockery—a shadow of a shade. What of that? It was competent to the Legislature to rectify it; whether by adopting the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, or by taking the power into their own hands, or in any other way, it was for them, and them alone, to decide.

Mr. R. was against this proposition on another ground. Because it went to abridge not merely the rights of the States, but because it did go to change the terms of the compromise upon which these States had come into the Confederation; to diminish very much the power of the large States, without, in the same ratio, diminishing that of the smaller States. This Constitution might be, as the gentleman had told the House, a popular Government; but, said Mr. R., I deny the fact. It is not, it never was, a popular Government. Considered in that light, it is one of the most unjust, oppressive, and iniquitous Governments on the earth. He hoped, he said, he was understood—that no gentleman would understand him to bring these charges against the Government; but it was so, grant gentlemen their premises. Looking at the features of the Government, compromise, he said, was stamped in every lineament; we can solve the difficulties of the Government in no other way than by regarding it as a Government of compromise; and in that view it was a good Government, for the term compromise supposes that the interests of every part are attended to, more or less, and that no particular portion of the community has been sacrificed to the rest. If this were a popular Government, why not introduce a resolution to this effect: that for every Representative on this floor an Elector should be chosen by the people? Why have we two additional Electors in each State? Because of the compromise at the commencement of the Government between the large and small States. What was the reason of all that was said in the Constitution about three-fifths of all other persons, &c., to avoid staining the statute book (he wished to God our consciences were not stained) with the name of slave? What was that provision inserted for? That this House, too, should be elected on the principle of compromise; and this compromise,

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. R. said he wished it to be understood, he did not mean to give up in this House or out of it. In the Senate the principle of compromise was conspicuous. As a sort of middle term between the two, each State was entitled to as many Electors as it has Senators and Representatives, to be chosen in such manner as each State shall direct. We must view this Constitution as a compromise among the confederated States; which, Mr. R. said, was the only principle on which a sound and practical statesman could find himself justified in acting in regard to it. Whenever that compromise was touched, if the balance was not nicely adjusted, if the centre of gravity was removed, no matter how little, it would be impossible for any member of this House to divine the consequences. Were the great States, he asked, willing to give up their Constitutional rights and power in the election of Electors, and that without any equivalent? Mr. R. said he came boldly to meet the question. No man had a right to expect that the great State of New York would give up the influence which she possessed in virtue of her population—which she rightfully possessed—for any consideration like those which had been urged. The State of New York was entitled to twenty-nine Electors; it might happen that the whole weight of the State of New York in the election of a President might be, if this proposition became a part of the Constitution, the casting vote of one Elector. Nay, the greatest State in the Union might have an equal number of Electors of the two political parties, and its influence be thus completely neutralized; the equation fairly worked, because, forsooth, it was better that the Electors should be chosen by the people than by the Legislature. That would be perfectly right, because the House had been told this was a popular Government, and the minority ought to have their due weight! They are already allowed it, Mr. R. said, in the Government itself, but not in the relations of that Government with foreign or with the confederated governments.

This proposition, Mr. R. said, appeared to him to strike at the very root of the Constitution of the United States. To that Constitution many of the ablest and best men in the country had been strongly opposed, on the ground that the powers of the States would be too feeble to cope with the powers of the General Government. The administration of the Government commenced on a different ground; but that party who had been the strongest advocates of the rights of the States prevailed; they got the Government, and, after they possessed themselves of it, they found that the doctrines which they supported when out of power, were not quite so convenient in the exercise of power, as they had been as the means of securing power. Whenever any case occurred involving the rights of the States, Mr. R. said they were laid over—obliged to rest for their defence on those who had been the enemies of the States. The sheep having been deserted by their dogs, it was easy to foretell their fate. Yes, he said, the rights of the States had been principally maintained, for many years, in this House, by the Representatives of that part of the country which had been in the highest degree inimical to the States; while their old friends had gone very snugly and comfortably to sleep on the benches of preferment.

As long as he had a seat on this floor, Mr. R. said, he should feel it his duty to oppose any proposition which would in any degree tend, first, to diminish the actual existing powers of the States; and, secondly, any proposition which went in any degree to change the actual existing compromise of weight and influence in this Government, between the greater and smaller States. The truth was, if the large States had a proposition to make, affecting their weight in the Government, so as to make it less in proportion to their wealth and population, it became the duty of the small States to inquire what they could give the large ones as an equivalent. In all public matters, where previous proportions have been settled, upon which the government of a country is to be carried on, any proposition going to change the fundamental state of the parties, is, and ought to be, met by a corresponding proposition of so much, by way of equivalent. Some gentlemen, said Mr. R., may think this language strange. But how was this Constitution formed? Search the records of the Convention. I will not worry your patience by a detail of its proceedings, but every feature of the Constitution shows that it was the result of compromise. We are very well as it is—as the Italian proverb has it, better above than under ground. It is not worth while to administer medicine to make that better, which I think is at present sufficiently well.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland said, he was constrained to differ with his honorable friend, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) but he hoped to remove his principal objection, that it would violate the compromise (meaning the Constitution) of the United States. Sir, said Mr. W., I must call the recollection of the House to the two modes of election now adopted by the several States, the general ticket mode and the district mode.

And here let me remark, that the States have evinced a preference of the district mode, by an almost entire adoption of it.

The adoption of this resolution will produce uniformity in the mode, and stability in its duration, by being made an article of the Constitution, so that every State will be represented, as it is—by a member of the political character of the district, which, by a general ticket, would be taken away, and thereby the minority of the States would be wholly unrepresented in the legislative council of the nation.

Sir, by the Constitution, Congress may direct by law that the Representatives in Congress shall be elected by a general ticket or by a district election, which would supersede any law of any State fixing a contrary mode, although each State has a right to adopt either mode, unless Congress shall legislate on the subject; thus, sir, there is a clashing of jurisdiction in the general mode, which the adoption of this amendment will prevent. Sir, Congress have, with great deference, avoided an interference with the State governments on this subject, although vested with supreme power, legislatively, to regulate the elections; and now, sir, although decided in the opinion that the district mode is the best, yet they forbear to act, but in concert with the States, three-fourths of which must concur before it can be adopted as the rule. And can we, for a moment, suppose that the Representatives of any State wished more than their just share of influence in the General Government, or to sacrifice the feelings and the rights of the minority in their said States? Sir, I hope my friend from Virginia will find in the Constitution a perfect power to make this amendment, without violating, in any respect, the letter or spirit of the instrument.

H. OF R.

Amendment to the Constitution.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Sir, in Maryland, we are laboring under a most oppressive mode of election in the State Legislature; by a total disregard to the numerical principle, the vital principle of a Republican Government, where a majority ought to govern, which it is feared, will not be corrected without a serious commotion. It is a fact that the district of Maryland, represented in Congress by my honorable colleagues, Messrs. SMITH and LITTLE, sends only six Representatives to the State Legislature, while the district represented by myself sends twelve. Sir, the election of members of Congress ought not only to be by one uniform mode, but at the same time. Sir, the State of Virginia has not yet made her election of members of Congress, the effect of which we have just witnessed. Suppose the Legislature of that State was now to direct their elections by a general ticket for any purpose, and thereby turn out her present Federal Representatives, would any man pretend that Virginia would be more correctly represented, or approve the act? I presume not. We have recently seen in Boston what little things Legislatures can do, by their denunciation of the Compensation bill, but we draw consolation from the recollection that the Hartford Convention has its origin in that body, whence the American people will know how to estimate their doings. Sir, I hope the present resolution will be adopted, as it is an appeal to the Legislatures of the several States, now generally in session, accompanied by this evidence of our approbation, and in the concurrence of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States will become the general law, whereby this source of discord may be extinguished, and uniformity and stability established. By submitting it, we should elicit the voice of the nation on this great question, and, I hope, establish a permanent rule.

Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, said, that the force of the objections made by the gentleman from Virginia, who had just sat down, was, that the amendment would lessen the weight of the large States, by preventing them from giving a united vote. The State which that gentleman represents, said Mr. P., has a mode of election of Electors established which secures the end he considers so essential, and it has united its vote by a general ticket for a long time past. Yet he condemns the elections as exercised in that State in strong terms, as a "mockery—a shadow of a shade." [Here Mr. RANDOLPH explained.] Mr. P. proceeded. Whether the error, of which the honorable gentleman so loudly complains, be in the mode of election in Virginia, or in the practice under it, is in effect the same thing, and is a strong admission against any mode of undivided vote. For, Mr. P. said, he thought it clear, that the practice so objectionable, if he understood it, was inseparable from any mode of undivided vote. He supposed the objection to allude to the nomination of candidates for Electors by the majority in the State Legislature, whereby the people are made machines, &c. If a general ticket must be formed, how, he asked, can it be done in a State of tolerable size, without some such concert? Can one individual form such ticket himself, with any hope of having his vote felt? By whatever mode then this concert obtains, whether by a party of representatives in the Legislature, or by whatever other collection of individuals, the principle is the same. And it requires counter-concert to frame a ticket in opposition. The voter is in either case a machine, moving by the influence of a caucus ticket; he cannot divide the candidates given him, without losing a share, nor take a new set without losing the whole weight of his suffrage. The evil complained of being inseparable from the general ticket mode, it applies of course to the mode itself with all the force the gentleman has given it. What other mode then remains for giving an undivided vote to the State? The only one yet practised upon is that of appointing the Electors by the State Legislatures directly; and if it is incorrect, that the majority of the Legislature should nominate a ticket for the people, will it not be as much so for them to appoint Electors without the people? The result of this reasoning is, that any mode which we have used for giving the undivided votes of the States, is subject to the same just imputation; it is a mere shadow and mockery of election.

Mr. P. said, he had great deference for the gentleman's abilities and experience on subjects of this kind, but thought his arguments predicated on a ground which was not strictly tenable—that the President is the Representative of the States, and not of the people. The number of Electors being in each State the same with that of the Representatives and Senators, seems to combine the National and Federative principles. The two extra Electors allowed without regard to population, was certainly a concession favoring the small States, and the remaining number, regulated by the amount of population, I am willing to submit, was a concession to the larger ones. By the proposed amendment, there is no attempt to change the number, and still a State will present a united suffrage, if the sentiment therein shall be sufficiently united. And in case it is not so, the loss to large States is not so great as at first might be supposed. This loss is not to be estimated abstractedly, but in relation to similar losses which other States of various sizes will sustain; the fractional balance of loss may not be of any moment, while the absolute loss may be considerable. But we are asked, what equivalent is given for this loss? I answer that an ample equivalent will be found in the tranquillity, and in the reform of the exercise of suffrage from a shadow to a reality—the purity in its exercise, and the security against its geographical division. Divisions of this character are the natural effect of united suffrage, while promiscuous differences have no such tendency. And as naturally are our States now tending towards undivided suffrage. Some States, from views of policy, have led the way; others, on the ground of self-defence, are imitating the precedent, and now several States choose Representatives by a solid vote; and few only of the States divide in the choice of Electors. This then being the tendency of the unfixed state of the matter, having the effect of encouraging sectional feelings and divisions, and these again tending to a disunion, is it not an ample equivalent for the concession to avoid these evil tendencies, and attain the advantages pointed out?

DECEMBER, 1816.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

The question was now taken on the first member of Mr. PICKEN's proposition, in the following words:

"For the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall be divided, by its Legislature, into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled.

"Each district shall contain, as nearly as may be, equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

"In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative."

And decided as follows: For that clause 86, against it 38.

So that more than the Constitutional majority of two-thirds decided in favor of this part of Mr. PICKEN's proposition.

Mr. JEWETT, of Vermont, proposed to strike out all the residue of the proposition, (relating to the election of Electors,) and in lieu thereof, to insert an amendment proposed by him, the object of which was, that the Electors of each State should be chosen from the representative districts; the two extra Electors to be chosen by the Legislature of the State.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that the question just taken on the first member of the resolution had surprised him more than any other vote he had witnessed in this House; because he took the vote in reference to the arguments by which it had been supported. The honorable member from North Carolina seemed to think that the greatest danger to this Government, the greatest bugbear, was disunion. In former days, Mr. R. said, it had been held that consolidation was the greatest danger; that the amalgamation of the States into a consolidated Government, which would sooner or later eventuate in a monarchy, was a much greater danger. If the gentleman's argument were correct, why had he provided that the division of each State into districts should be made by the States respectively? If this were not a Government of States, why had the gentleman not provided that the whole population of the country should be subdivided into a certain number of districts, without any reference to State limits, so as to add, for instance, a fractional part of the State of Virginia to a fractional part of the State of North Carolina? Because this is a Government of the States.

The possession of power, Mr. R. said, was of all known causes the greatest promoter of corruption. I begin to fear, said he, that the time is fast approaching, when we shall forget that the United States were, at the commencement of this confederation, free, sovereign, and independent States. There is another member of the resolution, not yet acted on, which is abhorrent to my principles—that the representation in this House and the election of President should be in the ratio of a certain number of heads. If we were about to make a constitution, I would hold up my hand against it, because I am for a free, equal, republican form of Government, and I contend that nothing could be less free, nothing could be more anti-republican, than to give to the city of New York an influence on this floor, or in the Legislature of that State, which her relative numbers entitle her to. The constitution of England is complained of; but what would be thought of a proposition to give to the city of London that influence in the Government which, on the popular principle, her numbers alone would allow to her? It would be signing over to the city of London the absolute dominion and property of the whole realm. Mr. R. said, he was not at all surprised that gentlemen who had not given sufficient consideration to this amendment, should so lightly have voted for a part of it. The single objection he had just stated, if it had nothing to do with the rights of the States, would be fatal to it. It was more competent, he said, for two individuals to represent the city of London, than for ten to represent the county of York, containing about the same population; because in the county of York there were a variety of interests, but the interest of the city of London was one and indivisible. Give to the city of New York, said Mr. R., which is the London of the United States, or will become so, a representation proportionate to her wealth and population, and you put a dagger into the heart of the Constitution of this country. Suppose the amendment to be adopted—fortunately for us, however, it will come under the revision of the States; I feel a hope that they will not commit an act of political suicide; that they will not commit an act of felo de se by sanctioning it—let that, said he, become a part of the Constitution of the United States, and I would not give a button for the rights of the States. They will become mere appendages to this great Government—not much more than counties; they will become proper instruments for the exercise of intrigue and faction.

Mr. R. said he had no hesitation in denying the position of the gentleman from North Carolina, that there had been, or would be, less excitement in elections by districts than in elections by general ticket. The reverse had been heretofore invariably and evidently the case. The election of twenty-five Electors in Virginia by general ticket had not created, and never would create, the smallest excitement. District the State, and then you will see. He was very sorry, very sorry he said—he asked pardon of the State for having done it—for having spoken of the electoral law of Virginia in this House. Whatever complaint he had against her, he would make at home and not here. The proposed amendment to the Constitution, said Mr. R., goes to consolidation. Gentlemen say, it is very fair; that it “stands to reason.” We ask them to prove it. They do not; for the gentleman from North Carolina, after undertaking to show that this is a popular Government, tells you that it was a concession to these small States that there should be Electors for Senators as well as for Representatives. And we, said Mr. R., have representation for our slave population, which was no more a compromise than the feature referred to. Why does he not move to strike that out? Why does he not carry the doctrine of perfectibility farther? Why not go on and resolve, that, Whereas the States are unfortunately divided into two factions, nearly equal in number and wealth, be it Resolved, and so forth, that each party shall have the privilege of exclusively choosing one branch of the Legislature? This would be almost as reasonable as some doctrines advanced on this subject. If, in the choice of Electors and Representatives, the whole United States constitute but one people, why not throw out the whole Union into districts? The Constitution, Mr. R. said, had settled how this should be done, and there he would leave it; and as to these jealousies, or heats, or animosities among the States, which had been spoken of, so help him God, he had never heard of anything of the kind among them. The Constitution has given them, said Mr. R., a power (of prescribing the mode of choosing Electors) and they have exercised it according to their good will and pleasure. Ita lex scripta est—so is the law. I never heard before the United States interfering to hush up State jealousies. No, sir, said Mr. R., we are able to manage our own affairs, and we ask nothing of you but to let us manage them in our own way. This whole proposition had a direct tendency to engulph in the Federal authorities all the power and authority of the State—of this great community, he meant. The tendency of the progress of the Government has been such. Look at the expenses of the Government? What were they a few years ago? What were they under Washington, Adams, Jefferson; what were they even under the early part of the Administration of Madison? What were they then, and what are they now? Do not gentlemen hold in their hands both money and power? What is the Army? What the Navy? What the amount of the Revenue? What the amount of the disbursements under this or that commissioner of the Government? Is not money power? Are we to be thrown into a tumult about a pitiful difference between so many dollars a day or a year for our compensation, and go on changing the balance of the powers of the Government, almost without exciting public attention?

Mr. R. said he had a full, a firm persuasion, that this matter had not received the consideration to which it was entitled, and which he hoped it would receive before the House determined this momentous matter. He had his doubts, he said, whether a proposition to make the office of President hereditary in the family of the next President, would go more directly to the establishment of monarchy in this country, than that now before the House. This proposition adopted, the next would be, some gentleman, discovering a large fraction of population in one State, would think it would conduce to equal representation, to add it to a fraction in the next State; and so we should go on, until at last the whole distinction between the State and General Governments would be rubbed out, and there would remain of the former nothing but institutions for the choice of Senators. Then, said he, what will happen? We shall all find that it is extremely expensive to maintain two Governments over one people; that we cannot serve both God and Mammon; and we shall have the choice to abolish the General Government or the State governments—and which would prevail, Mr. Chairman, I leave to your sagacity to determine.

Mr. R. said he had been called up by accident on this subject, because of the apathy which appeared to pervade the House; not having the least idea that it proceeded from a disposition to support the proposition before the House, which he supposed was introduced—something like the President's annual recommendation of the organization of the militia and the establishment of a National University—that it would be talked about, a bill got up, and then permitted to go to sleep. This Constitution, said Mr. R., was made by no ordinary men, under no ordinary circumstances. I am unwilling now to touch it; to “rush in where angels might fear to tread.” And, Mr. R. said, if ever there was a time more improper than the present to change the Constitution of the United States, he could not conceive such. A time when—what was the state of the fact?—when you can hardly excite any man on the election of the President. In Virginia, he said, there was no election in any county for Burgesses to the General Assembly which had not caused ten times the excitement that had been caused by the election of President of the United States. So, it seemed, the Constitution ought now to be changed, because everybody is satisfied with it as it stands! There was, Mr. R. said, a general disposition to acquiesce in its provisions, and no time could be more improper than this for meddling with the election of President of the United States. As to this House, that the State Legislatures, would consent to be dictated to by its recommendations, that was what he would never believe. It had been suggested to him this morning, he said, that the single power of sending a recommendation to this House, fair and plausible as presented to the public eye, was an immense power in the hands of the Executive. So it is, for every man is captivated with a specious proposition, without considering how it is to be done. The responsibility is off the President's shoulders, said Mr. R., and the people look to you for it.

Amendment to the Constitution.

One word more, said he, and I will finish. This is, of all times the last, when the House of Representatives ought to act on a proposition to change the Constitution, in any manner that will affect the relative weight of the States. This House lies, it is said, under heavy imputations; let us leave this question to those against whom no such imputations lie. Let us leave it to our successors. How many of us are likely again to take our seats in this House? Certainly not all. Ought not that consideration to have some weight on a question of such moment? At the next session, the people will have sent here another House of Representatives. The question is not so urgently impending—for I suppose, sir, the party is safe for eight years to come—let us defer the decision of this question to the next session, when men will come fresh from the people, perhaps more highly charged with the national will, and equally able to express it with ourselves.

Mr. PICKENS considered the principle or the effect so little differing from the original, that he would be content with the amendment, if the majority of this body approved of it. But believing the original not attended with any serious inconvenience, and rather most consistent with his views in principle, he should not vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, said, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEWETT) ought not to be acted on without some consideration. The plan of his honorable colleague was to divide each State into as many districts as the State had Electors, and in each of these districts to have an Elector chosen by the qualified voters among the people. The plan of the gentleman from Vermont was to divide each State into Congressional districts only, from each of which an Elector was to be chosen by the people, and to vest the Legislature of the State with the power of appointing the other two Electors. This latter proposition was supported by some considerations not to be disregarded. In the first place, it seemed more to consist with the theory of our Federal Constitution, which, in regard to the choice of a President, kept in view as well the federative as the popular principle. It would be recollected that, in apportioning Electors to the States, the Constitution had regard to their population, by assigning to them as many Electors as they respectively had Representatives; and had also regard to their federative capacity, by assigning to each, without distinction, two Electors, as it had assigned to each of them two Senators. Now, there would be an obvious congruity in giving the appointment of the two Electors to which each State was entitled, as a member of the Confederacy, to the Legislature of the State which represents its independent sovereignty; while the Electors, who represented the population of the State, should be chosen by the people, in proportion to their numbers. It was probable, too, that some inconvenience might result from the double division which it would be necessary to make of each State, upon the plan of his colleague—a division into districts, for the choice of Representatives, and another division into districts, a little more numerous, for the choice of Electors. On the other hand, there was a simplicity in the original plan which could not fail to recommend it, and a complexity in that suggested by the amendment, which perhaps more than overbalanced its advantages. He threw out these remarks to engage the attention of the Committee, and in the hope of ascertaining in which form the principle, which alike pervaded the original proposition and the amendment, was most likely to obtain their approbation. As for himself, he would candidly acknowledge that he saw so little difference in the practical results of either plan, and so strong was his attachment to the principle on which both were founded, that he was indifferent as to the form which might be preferred.

To the principle of the proposed amendment of the Constitution, I am, indeed, said Mr. G., a most zealous friend; and instead of feeling either astonishment or regret at the vote which has just passed, I hail it as a happy augury of that which will obtain on the remaining branch of the proposition. No man more reverences the Constitution than myself. No man would dread more any rash innovation on its principles. But this is not such an innovation. It alters not the fundamental terms of the contract—it merely regulates in detail, in conformity to these fundamental principles, a subject which had been left for regulation to the different State Legislatures, and which experience has shown ought to be regulated in the charter itself. And are we, in respect to the Constitution, to renounce the benefits of experience? Shall the lessons of practical wisdom, which are taught in that school, be received in vain? Such was not the design of the framers of the Constitution. They were aware that time would make manifest defects in that instrument, which no political sagacity could foresee, and they therefore provided, by the instrument itself, a process for its amendment. Surely, if experience has taught us anything in relation to our form of Government, it has shown that there ought to be an uniform and permanent mode of appointing Electors. It is demanded by the honor of our country, that some remedy should be devised to cure the shameful disorders which are obtruded upon our view, on the approach of every Presidential election. I speak without particular reference to parties, when I say the mode is everywhere made subsidiary to the immediate views and interests of the dominant faction. Nor do I think that we subject ourselves to the censure which the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) bestows on those who claim, as a part of the Federal Government, the right of arraigning the conduct of the State Legislatures. We do not now act in our ordinary capacity, as a branch of the Federal Legislature; we act in that peculiar character which has been imparted to us by the Constitution, of initiating amendments which are to be submitted to the consideration of the States. And it would be strange, indeed, if those to whom the people have granted this power were chargeable with arrogance when they inquire into the existing defects, and point out a suitable remedy; whether those defects are found to be inherent in the instrument itself, or to arise from the mal-administration of those whom that instrument has made the depositories of confidence. The gentleman from Virginia supposes that this subject has not been well considered. I believe that few subjects ever have received, in this country, so much consideration from those who have taken any part in public business. I will not say when it was first brought into notice—for I speak from general recollection—but certainly, for the last fifteen or sixteen years, it has in some way or other been before the public. At different times, during this interval, it has received the sanction of the Legislatures of New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and Virginia. It was, I believe, but the last Winter, that the Legislatures of the two latter States recommended it unanimously; and scarcely a session of Congress has passed for several years, but, in obedience to the earnest and unanimous wish of the Legislature of North Carolina, it has been brought under consideration here by some of the members from that State. Surely, there has been no precipitance in Congress; certainly, the subject is now understood, if it ever can be understood. Nor can I think that these States, large States, too, supposed they were seeking to break down State power, when they recommended such an amendment. 'Tis true, that such an amendment, in form, abridges the power of the State Legislatures, for it narrows their discretion as to the mode of appointing Electors. But, let it be shown (and if any gentleman can show it, it will be the gentleman from Virginia) that it deprives them of any beneficial power, of any power which can be available to them, by way of securing an equilibrium against Federal authority. The fact is, that it only takes away from them a matter of detail and regulation, onerous in itself, furnishing the materials for factious intrigue and manœuvre, and productive of no advantage to the States.

Mr. G. said his remarks were necessarily desultory, for they were unpremeditated; nor had he arisen with a view of entering into the merits of the great principle under consideration. He would, however, notice another remark of the gentleman from Virginia. It had been said, district elections of Electors would diminish the relative strength which the great States had in this Confederacy; and that, whether this strength was disproportionate or not, they were entitled to it by the original terms of the association, and ought not to be deprived of it. To this argument, it might be answered that it was the great States themselves which had requested this change, and surely it was not for them to complain of the alteration. But, even if such complaint could be made, he begged that it might be remembered that their present disproportionate power arose not from the original terms of the Confederacy, but from an alteration which had been made in those terms. It was to the amendment of the Constitution, directing that the Electors should designate, by their votes, between the President and Vice President, that the great States now owed their exclusive claim to these offices. And if the effect of the proposed amendment should be to communicate some additional power to the smaller States, it would be but to restore the ratio fixed by the original compact.

Mr. G. repeated that his wish, in regard to the proposition by the gentleman from Vermont, was to ascertain what effect its adoption would have on the success of the principle contained in the proposition of his colleague. To afford some opportunity for an interchange of opinions, and for a further discussion of the subject, he moved that the Committee should now rise.

When Mr. G. concluded, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, December 19.

Mr. CONNER presented a petition of Francis Le Barron, praying for permission to open and work any copper mine which he may discover on the southern shores of Lake Superior, or on the islands in that lake, for a certain number of years, upon such terms and conditions as the nature and importance of the subject may suggest to the wisdom of Congress; which was ordered to be referred to a select committee; and Messrs. CONNER, ROOF, and THOMAS WILSON, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. FORNEY, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making such alteration in the organization of the corps of artillery, as will place the officers of that corps upon a more equal footing, as regards promotion, with the officers of other corps of the Army.

On motion of Mr. POPE, the Committee on Indian Affairs were directed to present to the House a general view of the measures that have been adopted under the several laws providing for the establishment of trading-houses with the Indian tribes, so as to show whether the expenses thereof have been defrayed by the profits, without diminishing the capital, or requiring auxiliary appropriations; and also to show at what points trading-houses are established under those laws.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the establishment of land offices for the sale of the public lands in the Territory of Missouri, at the following places: At the town of Arkansas, in the county of Arkansas; at the town of Jackson, in the county of Cape Girardeau; at the seat of justice, in the county of Lawrence; and at the seat of justice, in the county of Howard.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the better regulating the leasing and working the public lead mines belonging to the United States, in Missouri Territory, in such a manner as to protect the lessees in the quiet enjoyment of their leases, and to enable the Government to collect its rents.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the leasing and working the salines belonging to the United States, in the Missouri Territory, or such part thereof as it shall be deemed advisable to put into operation for public use.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so amending or explaining the fourth section of the act for designating, surveying, and granting, military bounty lands, passed on the fifth of May, 1812, as to authorize a devise of said bounty lands, though no patent shall have been granted therefor, at the time of the devise.

Mr. BARBOUR observed, on this motion, that the object of that section of the law was to prevent a sacrifice, by discharged soldiers, of their property, without knowing or realizing its value; but it could never have been the intention of the Legislature to prevent a man from disposing of his own unquestionable property, on his decease, to any other person than the heir at law, if he should so will. This construction, however, had been given, and it was this construction he wished to be corrected.

The resolve was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in introducing the following resolution, adverted to the obvious importance of a correct report of the decisions of cases adjudged in the Supreme Court. The subject had been before Congress at the last session, and a bill had passed the Senate to authorize the appointment of a reporter of the decisions of cases adjudged in the Supreme Court, but from the press of business had not been acted on in this House. To bring the subject again before the House, he moved "That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the appointment of a reporter to the Supreme Court of the United States."

The resolve was agreed to.

TRADE WITH THE INDIANS.

Mr. POPE, of Illinois, moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of excluding foreigners from trading with the Indians residing within the limits of the United States.

Mr. FORSYTH of Georgia, suggested to the gentleman, that his object, as ascertained from the face of his resolution, had been already attained by an act passed at the last session.

Mr. POPE said, that the act referred to gave to the Government a dispensing power. His opinion was, that there ought to be no such power, and that foreigners ought to be entirely excluded. Such a course would relieve the Indians from their present dependence upon the British traders, the ill effects of which were at present very evident.

Mr. DESHA suggested a modification of the motion, so as to refer the subject to the Committee on Indian Affairs, instead of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which Mr. POPE acceded.

Mr. FORSYTH then suggested to Mr. POPE the propriety of defining his object more precisely, because, from the terms of the resolution now proposed, it would appear as if there was no law in existence, excluding foreigners from trading with the Indians. There was such a law, and it would be better, he thought, that the gentleman should specify in his motion the particular part of it he desired to see amended.

Mr. POPE said he had not only in view the object he had mentioned, to repeal the dispensing proviso to the act of last session, but that the committee should also recommend such measures as would insure a due and certain execution of other provisions of the law in question.

The resolve was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House proceeded to the order of the day, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take further into consideration Mr. PICKENS's proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STRONG, of Massachusetts, proposed an amendment to an amendment of Mr. JEWETT, (now under consideration,) the subject of which was, as Mr. JEWETT's motion proposed that the Electoral districts should be the same in number as the Representative districts, to further provide that the Representative should also be the Electoral districts.

Mr. HUGER, of South Carolina, took the floor, and observed, that he had paid less attention than he should otherwise have done to the subject under consideration, in consequence of the apathy and indifference which generally prevailed during the early part of the debate, and the impression thereby made on his mind, that a large majority of the Committee was opposed to the system of election by districts. He had since discovered that this impression must have been erroneous, and had therefore voted against going into the Committee of the Whole again on that day, in order to obtain further time for reflection. As the House, however, had thought proper to proceed, and the question would probably be taken that morning, he would venture to make a few remarks, crude and undigested, as he feared they would be found.

He was strongly impressed with the propriety, or rather necessity, of establishing some one uniform mode of election throughout the United States, and believed that by districts laid out in the several States, by the Legislatures thereof, at certain fixed periods, to be the most eligible and most conformable to the true spirit of the Constitution, which could be devised. He had been, therefore, highly gratified at the vote given yesterday in the Committee of the Whole. From that vote he felt authorized to infer, that there was a decided Constitutional majority of that body who, with himself, approved of the system of district elections. Under this conviction, he should decline taking up the time of the Committee by any observations on the merits of the abstract principle which had already received their approbation, and proceed to inquire how far it might be expedient to adopt the second member of the resolution, which proposes to extend the same principle to the election of Chief Magistrate, which the first, already adopted, did—to the election of the members of the popular branch of the Legislature. In doing this, he should commence by endeavoring to meet and obviate some of the principal objections made to the proposed amendments generally, and more especially to the one respecting the Electors of President and Vice President, immediately under consideration.

It had been objected, that this was not the proper time to do anything, inasmuch as there was no excitement in the public mind, and our national concerns were progressing smoothly and prosperously. To him, on the contrary, it would seem, for these very reasons, the most proper time to investigate and act upon subjects of this kind. A most profound peace reigned among the civilized nations of Europe, with whom we had any political relations, as well as on this side of the Atlantic. All those passions and domestic feuds which had unfortunately divided and agitated the good people of these United States since the Constitution had been adopted, had subsided, and he trusted were at an end. The individual who was to fill the office of Chief Magistrate for the next four years, had just been elected; consequently, that election could in no wise be affected by a decision made at this time, in favor or against the amendment proposed. Party feelings were altogether extinct; or, if perchance any latent sparks still remained, there was nothing on the present occasion to rouse them into a flame. It was next to impossible that there should exist any undue influence or improper motive to bias the vote of a single member; nor could he well conjecture any other motive or inducement to vote for or against the resolution now proposed, save an honest conviction, on the mind of the member about to give his vote, that it was right or wrong. Surely no more favorable moment could be imagined, or asked for, to take up and decide upon the expediency of making a change of any kind, be it more or less important, in the great national compact.

Neither could the gentleman who introduced these amendments be accused of having brought them forward of his own mere motion and caprice, or without strong and sufficient inducements. There was not a person within the walls of that House who was not aware of the abuses which had taken place in regard to the election of the Electors of President and Vice President; nor would any one, he believed, deny that the present mode of choosing the President had a strong tendency to prevent the attainment of the great object aimed at originally by the framers of the Constitution, to wit: that of securing at the head of the General Government a pure elective Magistracy. Who indeed was not apprized of the various turns, and twists, and quirks, which had alternately been adopted by different States, or rather predominant factions in different States, to insure a result of the election of the day favorable to their wishes and views? How many and how frequent changes had been made in the mode of election, on the spur of the occasion, and to effect some temporary and factious purpose. It could not be necessary to recall to the minds of the Committee the Congressional caucusses, the Legislative caucusses, the town and city, and ward caucusses, and all that train of abuses, which had sprung up of late years, and been introduced by artful and intriguing men, to influence elections, and take them virtually, if not nominally, out of the hands of those in whom the Constitution wisely intended to vest them. But nothing more conclusive could be adduced on this branch of the subject, than the observations which fell from the gentleman from Virginia yesterday. He had stated himself to the Committee in so many words, "that he was decidedly opposed to the manner in which the State he represented had exercised its Constitutional power in regard to the election of Electors; that he felt himself aggrieved, as a freeholder of that Commonwealth, by the manner in which the late election of Electors had been carried on; that it was the mere mockery of an election—a shadow of a shade."

The people of North Carolina, the more immediate constituents of the mover of the resolution before them, had been peculiarly and frequently agitated, in consequence of the unsettled mode of electing the Electors of the President and Vice President; and the Legislature of that State had again and again, he believed, unanimously recommended an election by districts, both of the Electors of the Executive, and of the members of that body. Neither was that respectable State insulated, or alone in making the recommendation. Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and, as he had just been informed, New York—the four largest and most important States in the Union, had each, at different times within a few years, and with the indiscriminate approbation of both political parties, recommended the same or similar amendments to the Constitution. He drew two important inferences from this fact: first, that these powerful States had each experienced much inconvenience and serious evils from the present unsettled and changeable mode of electing the Electors of the President and the members of the popular branch of the Legislature. Secondly, that the system of electing the one and the other by districts, had suggested itself to them all, as the most eligible and most likely to remedy the evils they had severally experienced. Supported by such high authority, he yielded the more readily to the dictates of his own judgment, in affording his feeble support to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Amendment to the Constitution.

But they were warned in glowing language of the danger of approaching the sacred charter of our rights, or meddling with the nicely-adjusted provisions of the Constitution. He felt the full force of the appeal. It accorded equally with the dictates of his judgment, the sympathies of his heart, and all the early prejudices of his political life. Attachment to the provisions of the Constitution, as it originally came forth from the Convention, and was afterwards adopted with amendments, by the several States, was what he understood to be regarded as true and genuine federalism. It was in this view of the subject, and upon this principle, that he had accepted of the appellation of Federalist; not merely from attachment to any party, however greatly he might have esteemed, and been attached to the individuals composing it. Such indeed was his veneration for the Constitution; such the awe, the dread, and the superstitious reluctance with which he ever approached it, that he was almost prepared to accept of the well known alternative prescribed on a former, and somewhat similar occasion, and oblige the individual who proposed an amendment to it, to do so with a halter around his neck. On the present occasion, however, he felt himself not so much supporting an alteration in the fundamental principles or provisions of the Constitution, as endeavoring to restore it in some degree to that form and symmetry in which it proceeded out of the hands of its original framers, and which it possessed previously to the change adopted some years since in regard to the election of President and Vice President, by designating each, and thereby destroying the whole machinery so dexterously, and as he had always conceived, so happily contrived by the Convention. He remembered perfectly when this change was introduced and carried, for he had at the time a seat in that House. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) and himself, then stood in a relative situation, diametrically opposite to that in which they were now placed. Those who thought with him, as well as himself, had then in like manner, though in less powerful language, no doubt argued against change and innovation. But they were laughed at, and compared, as he well remembered, to a certain nation, who were represented to have been so attached to old habits, that, because their forefathers had once harnessed their ploughs to the tails of the animals which drew them, they could never be induced to alter the mode, ridiculous as it was, or change it for any other, though evidently more convenient.

He hailed, however, most cordially the revolution which had taken place in this, as well as in so many other respects, in the opinions of gentlemen. It afforded him peculiar satisfaction to find that those, who some years ago had promoted most strenuously the change in the mode of electing the Executive branch of Government, had been taught by experience, at least, to doubt of the wisdom of the measure, and to express something like regret at the part they had taken in bringing it about. For himself, although he had no disposition to enter into a lengthy discussion of what had been done, and felt all due deference for his own, as well as the other States, which had sanctioned the alteration he alluded to, by adopting it; yet he might, he trusted, be permitted to say, without giving offence to any party, that, in his estimation, the original provision of the Constitution, in regard to the mode of electing the Executive branch of the Government, had not had that fair, full, and sufficient trial to which it was entitled, and that the feelings and irritation of the moment had led to the change in it, by designating the respective individuals who were to fill the offices of President and Vice President, rather than cool investigation, mature deliberation, or any strong evidence that such an amendment would be really an improvement in the system or mode of election introduced by the Convention.

Were it possible to get the Constitution restored, in this respect, to its pristine form, he should be perfectly satisfied. He had no hesitation in acknowledging that he should prefer such a course to the amendment under consideration, or any measure whatever. But the time was not yet arrived when he could entertain even the hope of this being brought about. He must, therefore, accept of the next best alternative, which he thought to be the uniform mode, now proposed, of choosing the Electors of the President by districts throughout the United States. Indeed, the practice and abuses in regard to the election of the Executive branch of the Government, where everything was left to the whim and caprice of the moment, and no sort of check provided against intrigue or any other abuse, had been found from experience so objectionable, and were evidently so pregnant with evil and future mischief, that scarcely any change could be devised which would not, in his estimation, afford the probable chance of a better state of things.

It had been further urged, as an objection not to be gotten over, that the amendment proposed was contrary to the spirit, and totally abhorrent to every principle upon which the Constitution was founded. The Constitution, they were told, was a mere matter of compromise and expediency, and had nothing to do with the principles and admitted axioms belonging to popular Government. He neither acquiesced in the soundness nor force of the objection, nor in the accuracy of the exposition as to the features of the Constitution. He felt no hesitation, indeed, in acknowledging, that the Government under which we lived was one of compromise and expediency; but insisted that it was a compromise avowedly intended and understood, ab initio, to be engrafted upon popular principles. These principles, it was true, were modified in many respects, and in a great variety of ways, by the compromise entered into. The federal principle of distinct States having separate and distinct rights, particularly in regard to the management of their own internal concerns, was beyond all doubt one of the features of that compromise. On the other hand, the immediate agency of the people, in contradistinction to that of the State sovereignties, was another feature no less strongly marked on the face of it, and which extended, pari passu, throughout all its provisions. Banishing, then, all idle disputes about words, he contended the Constitution or compromise was founded upon and compounded of two perfectly distinct principles—the one federal, the other popular.

These two principles would be found blended and preponderating alternately, in a greater or less degree, in every article and section of the written compact, which he held in his hands. The very first words of that instrument proved beyond all doubt that it was understood to emanate immediately from the people, not merely from the State sovereignties, under which the people had previously lived. The words are, "we, the people of the United States, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." Thus showing at the very outset, that the Constitution emanated from the people of the United States, acting for themselves in their original capacity, not at second hand, through their local or State sovereignties; and in like manner showing that it was a compromise founded as well on federal as on popular principles. Thus, too, all legislative power is, in the first article and first section, vested in a Congress, to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives—the latter upon the popular principle, to be composed of members chosen by the people of the several States; the former upon the federal principle, of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof.

Granting, then, that the amendment under consideration might lean somewhat more towards the popular and encroach some little upon federal principle, by bringing the election nearer to the people themselves—this was evidently neither contrary to the spirit, nor abhorrent to the original principles upon which the Constitution had been founded. It was, in plain and simple truth, nothing more or less than a new modification of these principles, proposed to be brought about in the form and manner specified by the Constitution itself; which modification experience had proved to be necessary, but nevertheless could not take place until submitted to, and duly ratified by a Constitutional majority of the Legislatures of the several States. And if it were true—another leading objection urged by gentlemen—if it were true that by introducing this new modification of the mode of election, the right of the great States to wield the collected mass of their population and power at will, was, quo ad hoc abridged, without comparatively, and in the same ratio abridging that of the smaller States, or as it has been more forcibly expressed, without an equivalent; he would ask in turn, what equivalent had ever been given or even offered to the smaller States, when they were deprived of the check, or at least neutralizing effect in the election of the Executive, which had been secured to them in the Constitution previously to the alteration in the mode of electing the President and Vice President, by designating each? They had never asked nor received any. This new modification, therefore, of the mode of election was the more equitable and less objectionable, as it had a tendency to restore in some degree the equilibrium in this respect, between the great and small States, which had been so carefully established in the original compact.

Here, he would observe, that all those who were at all versed in the history of the times, or had ever heard anything of the proceedings in the Convention which formed the Constitution, well knew, that by far the greatest difficulty experienced in adjusting the provisions of it, was, with regard to the Executive branch of the Government, and in particular as to the mode of selecting or electing the Chief Magistrate. In all Governments, but more especially those which were in any degree founded on Federal or popular principles, this had ever been the great stumbling block, the all important desideratum; nor had the difficulty, as far as he had learned, ever yet been entirely gotten over. He had understood from all those of the original members of the Convention, whom he had ever enjoyed the advantage of hearing converse on the subject, that this had been found the great Herculean task in the Convention; that this point had been longer and more frequently agitated, and that more projects and contrivances had been submitted to their consideration in regard to it, than perhaps all the other provisions of the Constitution, taken together. It had been early agreed, that the three great branches of the Government should be distinct and independent of each other; that the powers of the Executive should be vested in a single individual; that the legislative branch should consist of two Houses, the one federal, immediately chosen by and representing the States; the other popular, immediately chosen by and representing the people; and that the Judiciary should consist of judges holding their offices during good behaviour. These great outlines of the Constitution were early arranged, and of comparatively little difficulty in the adjustment. But it was long, very long, and not until after the subject had been sifted again and again in every way, and presented to view in every possible shape, that the mode of electing the Executive branch of the Government had been adopted. He had understood it to have been, in the first instance, determined that the President should be elected by Congress. Upon further reflection, this determination was not deemed satisfactory, was reconsidered, and rescinded. It was also proposed that he should be elected by the State Legislatures, by the people in the several States, by the people at large. In short, every project which the ingenuity of the members could devise and present to the consideration of the Convention, was in turn examined and rejected. The subject, with all these various projects, was at last referred to a large and most respectable committee, who ultimately suggested the system in regard to the election of the Executive branch of the Government, which had been adopted, and which, he had been assured, was regarded by the original framers, as by far the most admirable and important feature in the Constitution. By that system, it will be recollected, that the Electors were obliged to vote for two persons of different States, without designating either as President and Vice President. Hence, in case of any unfair combination of the larger States, (at that day the danger most apprehended,) or any undue attempt on the part of any powerful faction or great predominating interest, the smaller States, or minority, had an efficient check, it being necessarily in their power, either to turn the scale in favor of the least objectionable of the two candidates, and thus insure his favor when President, or at least to elect the Vice President, then the real heir apparent, and not, as in subsequent times, the mere puppet of party, selected, because he was unfit to be Chief Magistrate, or accepted in the way of barter and sale, to secure the election of a favorite individual to the Presidency. But, in an evil hour, at a moment of irritation and high excitement, this admirable feature in the Constitution had been destroyed by designating the individuals who were to fill the respective offices of President and Vice President; everything like balance and check was done away; and the election of the Chief Magistrate left entirely to the prevailing faction, or rather to two or three artful individuals, who might get the highest bidder, perhaps, nominated in that unconstitutional and monstrous contrivance—a modern Congressional caucus. It was, then, he repeated, to obviate the evils already experienced, and the mischief likely to arise, from this baneful state of things, and to restore, in some degree, the Constitution to its pristine shape and original symmetry, that he supported the amendment proposed, not from desire of innovation, still less from any wish, on his part, to impair the rights of the large States. It was, moreover, particularly worthy of remark, that, in doing this, the federal principle of the Constitution, though newly modified, was still carefully preserved, and formed a strong feature in the amendment. The election would be brought nearer to the people, it was true, by introducing throughout the United States a uniform mode of choosing Electors by electoral districts, and thereby putting it out of the power of the Legislatures of the several States to appropriate, on the spur of the occasion, that high prerogative to themselves, in the great scuffle for ascendancy, which so frequently took place among them. But the number and proportion of Electors were to continue the same; two Electors were still to be allowed, under either of the modifications proposed, for the two Senators each State was entitled to; a provision supposed to have been originally adopted in favor of the small States. At the same time, each State would continue to have an additional number of Electors, equal to the number of members it had in the popular branch of the Legislature; and districts, equal in number to the Electors each State might be entitled to, were to be laid out by the Legislature thereof, in each respective State. The whole people, then, of each respective State, would continue to enjoy the same relative weight in the election of a Chief Magistrate, which, according to the Constitutional ratio, they now possessed. But one great and important object, among many others, would be obtained. All danger from geographical divisions and jealousies on the approach of an election would be done away. Not only all the different interests of each State, but all the various and complicated interests scattered throughout the vast extent of the whole United States, would have a full and efficient voice in the election of the Executive. It was reasonable, therefore, to conclude that he would generally be elected by the majority of these interests combined, and not by one great leading and preponderating interest or faction. The East, the West, the North, and the South, would each have its proportionate influence in the election; and no one or two geographical portions or divisions of the Union, by combination, intrigue, or otherwise, would be enabled to overwhelm the others. The Chief Magistrate would consequently be, as was intended, emphatically the choice of the whole people, and of all the different interests throughout the Union, elected by the people in conformity to the ratio established upon the federal and popular principles engrafted on the Constitution. What more can be asked or wished for? What other mode could be devised more likely to give universal satisfaction, and consequently to insure permanency to the Union—ultima thule—the great end of all their hopes, and fears, and labor.

Amendment to the Constitution.

When Mr. G. had concluded, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 20.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the discharge of Nathaniel Taft from his imprisonment, which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; a bill to incorporate the Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington, in said town of Georgetown; a bill to incorporate the Union Bank of Alexandria; a bill to incorporate the Patriotic Bank of Washington; a bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; a bill to prevent the circulation of the notes of unchartered banks within the District of Columbia; all which bills were read, and referred to the same Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report upon the state of the finances, which was read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, the House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the proposition to amend the Constitution so as to establish a uniform mode of election of Representatives and Electors—

Mr. GROSVENOR said, that he had once before, upon this same amendment, delivered his sentiments in this House at length. He would not detain the Committee at this time to repeat all the arguments which had occurred to him. In many he had been anticipated, and it would be criminal to spend time in travelling over the self-same ground which had been so ably and accurately explored by others.

There could be no doubt, Mr. G. said, that the Constitution was founded on a compromise of the interests, principles, and prejudices of the various States; and it was as little to be doubted that in that instrument were to be found a combination of two distinct principles, the federative and the popular. In some parts the people were recognised as citizens of the Union, and were empowered to exercise their rights without the control or check of the State governments. In other parts they were recognised as citizens of distinct sovereign States, and empowered to exercise their rights as members of the Union, only through State organs. The framers of the Constitution deemed this combination of distinct principles, and distinct sovereignties in our Government, as essential to its success and duration; and, Mr. G. said, so essential had the full support of the Federal principle in the Government been deemed by him, that he never doubted that he was the evil angel of our system, who should have influence enough to strip the States of their dignity and their sovereignty, and to consolidate all sovereign power in the General Government.

Mr. G. said, he must view with great jealousy every proposition bearing an aspect unfriendly to the rights and influence of the States; and if, as his honorable friend from South Carolina (Mr. HUGG) had stated already, by amendments of the Constitution, branches of power and sovereignty have been dropped from the State governments, and grafted on the General Government, so far from furnishing an inducement to make further inroads on the power and dignity of the States, it was a strong argument against this or any other attempt still further to reduce them.

The frame of our Government, said Mr. G., is of a most delicate and complicated texture. The machinery was put together by sages, philosophers, and practical sound statesmen. Hitherto it has run well—and although it may have produced some evils, and exhibited some defects, it has, upon the whole, accomplished, and promises long to accomplish, the great objects for which it was organized.

Let me conjure gentlemen to approach it with caution. In a general view, nothing can be more destructive to any nation, than the indulgence of a restless spirit of innovation, which will never suffer the fundamental principles of the Government to stand or fall, by the tests of practice and experience.

To a constitution, framed like our own, the result of compromise and contract among independent sovereign States, complicated and novel, the above remark applies with peculiar force. I hold it, therefore, as a political axiom, that no essential or important provision of our Constitution is to be destroyed or changed, until, by a fair and full test of practice and experience, it is found productive of evils highly detrimental to the State, and which, without such destruction or change, cannot be remedied.

But, said Mr. G., if any provisions of our Constitution should be held more sacred from innovation than others, it was surely that class which divided and distributed the sovereign powers of the country between the States and the General Government. Prominent in this class, is the provision now proposed to be abolished; it provided for the election of a Chief Magistrate, the most interesting as well as important object provided for by the Constitution.

Thus, is this right vested in every State, to be exercised according to its sovereign will, without the slightest control of any earthly power. It is a great and distinguished attribute of sovereignty; a substantial, sovereign, independent right to designate the man who shall preside over the Union. Destroy this attribute of sovereignty—erase this prominent federative feature from the Constitution; advance one step further—take from the State Legislatures the right to elect Senators, and you may then search in vain for another federative feature in that instrument; you may look in vain for any recognition of the State sovereignty for any valuable or substantial purpose. The Government becomes a consolidated popular Government—and all those benefits which the wisest men have thought would result from its federative character, are thrown to the winds, without ceremony or trial.

Sir, I would pause long before I would sanction an attempt to produce a consummation so dangerous.

When I behold the armies, the navies, the wide system of taxation, the immense revenues, and the boundless resulting patronage, which circumstances have, in the very infancy of our nation, accumulated in the hands of the General Government, I cannot but view with reprehension those constant efforts to strip of all power, and dignity, and strength, the States of the Union; to reduce to insignificance and feebleness those very powers, intended by the framers of the Constitution to check all abuse of power in the General Government, and finally to constitute barriers impassable to any despot.

Nor let any one object to this, the fact that a majority of the States have heretofore supported, instead of opposing, the policy of the General Government. In ordinary times, such a coincidence is every way desirable.

But does it here follow, that in times of real danger, they would not rally under the standard of opposition, and save the country? Does it follow, because, in the struggles of party violence, or upon questions of general expediency, a majority of the States have generally supported the Chief Magistrate, whom they had elected, that, therefore, they would aid him in subverting their own liberties, and producing their own destruction?

No, sir, if ever the time shall arrive, when the Executive of this Union, wielding his mighty power and patronage, shall advance to the subversion of the liberties of his country, then the wisdom of our fathers will receive the crown of experience. For then these very States will constitute a sovereign phalanx, under whose legitimate and Constitutional banner the people may rally, and crush at once the feeble usurper who should assail their rights.

This, sir, is my view of this interesting subject. I think the proposed amendment strikes at the very root of our safety. On every occasion, I would pause long, and search most earnestly for some other remedy for any evil or mischief, before I would detract one scintilla from the sovereign power and dignity of the States.

But, really, sir, I would yet ask, What are the evils which result from this exercise of right by the States? And how does this proposed amendment provide a remedy?

1st. We are told that there is a great want of uniformity in the manner of choosing Electors in the several States; that in some that choice is by districts, in others by general ticket; in others by the Legislature.

And pray, Mr. Chairman, who informed the honorable mover of this amendment, that this was an evil? Why is uniformity desirable? Of what importance is it to Virginia that New York appoints her Electors by the Legislature, or to New York that Virginia appoints her Electors by general ticket?

It is to be sure a fancy, rather pretty than otherwise, that the whole Union should be marked off upon the map in lots or districts of thirty miles square, and that on the same day, and in the same manner, the men of each district should vote for Electors. But is uniformity then obtained? Not at all. In Virginia none could vote for Electors, but the landholders; while in the contiguous State of Maryland, every man above his minority would have a voice in the election. To obtain uniformity you must either force the aristocracy of Virginia to mingle their suffrages with the democracy of the State, or you must persuade the poor of Maryland to relinquish that dearest of all rights to which they have been accustomed. Where is the gentleman bold enough to hint at such an invasion of the rights of any State?

But suppose you obtain this mighty boon, uniformity—what practical benefit do you secure? Sir, it is a shadow—a phantom—a thing that sounds smoothly, but of no real value; and to obtain this shadow, I can never consent to strip the States of an important sovereign right, and sink them into insignificance.

But another evil is mentioned—the power and influence of the great States. It is said that Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, by obtaining twelve votes from any other State, and adding them to their united suffrage, may elect a President in defiance of all the other States.

But do gentlemen imagine that by this amendment they provide a remedy for this evil? They are utterly mistaken. Against this evil the Constitution originally contained an effectual antidote; it contained a provision directing the votes to be given indiscriminately for President and Vice President, and he who had the greater number became the Chief Magistrate.

This secured to the small States the power of defeating the combination of the larger States in favor of any individual or any State. It also enabled any minority of States to defeat any caucus nomination of any individual. The madness and folly of the small States surrendered that provision to the violence of party. They consented to strike it from the Constitution, and no man can now doubt that by that act they bound themselves in those chains which they are now endeavoring in vain to burst asunder—smarting with a consciousness of their own fanatic folly, they seem ripe for any change. “Innovation, innovation,” is the constant clamor; “our condition cannot be worse—any change must improve our condition.”

Sir, this is the very language of mortification and despair. Why will you innovate? You will effect nothing. In 1802, when, worshipping the rising star of Virginia, you surrendered your power to the clamor of party—you surrendered it forever.

You may struggle in the toils; you may clank your chains and gnash your teeth at the remembrance of your own folly; you but beat the air; those mammoth States who hold you in fetters will but laugh at your bootless rage, and draw them the closer.

Pass this amendment, you leave the great States entire; their power, and numbers, and influence remain uncrippled. Think you they will imitate the gullibility of the small States, and return what has been given them? District the great States, and are they thereby made smaller? Is their relative power diminished? And if in times of party violence some hope might be entertained that different districts in the same State might return Electors of different political views, yet such a hope would be now idle.

Those party feelings, which have so long arrayed men against men in every State, are fast subsiding. They may not be wholly obliterated, but I do apprehend they will so far soon vanish as to leave the spirit of the State in its full operation. In many, nay in most of the States, this condition of parties is already realized. Unaided by party feelings, of what avail to reduce the influence of the great States will your districting plan be? Of none whatever. The pride of the State will be felt in every district, and in perfect consent they will return an undivided vote in favor of the man whom a caucus shall designate as the Cæsar of the Republic.

No, sir, you may patch, and botch, and tinker the Constitution, until its own fathers shall no longer recognise a single feature of its early existence, you will not remedy the evil. There is but one remedy: coax, if you can, the great States to relinquish the power you foolishly gave them, when, in compliment to Virginia, you immolated the smaller States in 1802. Then, and not till then, will those States find themselves able to frustrate any combination in favor of the child of party, or the aspiring demagogue.

Another evil has been mentioned—a minority of the people of the Union may now actually elect a Chief Magistrate. If this be so, how is a remedy provided by this amendment? This is not the result of the mode in which Electors are appointed, but of the existence of Electors in our system. So long as an intermediate body of men is interposed between the people and the President, upon the vote of which the election depends, such an event is of course possible. No matter how that intermediate body of men is elected, whether by districts, by general ticket, or the Legislatures of the States, so long as it is constituted of members elected in the different States, and so long as it is a body which independently may call any man to the Chief Magistracy, it may always happen that the voice of the minority of the whole Union may elect the President.

If this be an evil, it results solely from the admission of Electors of President into our system. There is no effectual remedy but to strike from the Constitution the office of Elector, and vest the election directly in the people. I imagine gentlemen, in all their rage of innovation, are not prepared for a change so radical and dangerous; and when we consider that the case has not yet occurred, nor is likely ever to occur, we need not feel much anxiety to provide barriers against it.

Another evil has furnished a topic for much declamation. We are told that in some of the States the voice of the minority is entirely unheard in the election of President. And is not the voice of the minority always ineffectual in every election? There is nothing novel in this. If the States are districted, the minority are in the same predicament. The voice of the minority in each district will never be heard; and thus the mischief, if indeed it be at all a mischief, the same in principle, the same in extent, but varied only in form, would remain in all its force.

The truth is, in every election, no matter what its form, the will of the majority must prevail. Their voice must be victorious in every choice; and that of the minority must be unregarded. The committee must at once perceive the vanity of any attempt to remove a consequence flowing directly from the nature of every free Government, and from the essential principles of representation.

I come now to the last and great complaint. Executive interference in the election of a successor—the deformity of a legislative caucus—

State intrigues—have been rung in our ears without cessation. The disgraceful scenes of last winter in this Capitol, the apathy of the people, the unconstitutional manner in which the Chief Magistracy has been disposed of, have been painted in glowing colors, and we have been asked, will you not take a cure for all these disorders? Here it is—this amendment—take it—the monster caucus will die, Executive influence is strangled, and State intrigue will live no longer. All this may be so; but before I take the remedy, I wish to examine its composition. I would survey the disorders to be removed or healed, and then I would examine well whether the remedy offered is a prescription of efficacy and power, or whether it be some nostrum of political quackery, before I would consent to swallow it.

That great abuses have entered into the election of a Chief Magistrate, none can deny. That through the agency of that modern invention—a legislative caucus—the Executive finds no difficulty in designating his successor with greater certainty than could the first tyrants of imperial Rome—the Cæsars—who should succeed them, is unfortunately too true.

That in many of the States the managers of a party have converted the right of election into a farce, by intrigues and violence, without precedent or parallel, is perhaps also true. Nor can I join the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) in exempting his "own dear native State" from its full share in these disgraceful scenes. On the contrary, she has, in my opinion, contributed more than any other State—more than all other States—to transfer, substantially, the election to a caucus of Congressmen, and to fix and perpetuate the influence of that unconstitutional monster. What was the business of the grand committee appointed the last winter at Richmond? Why, to take up the candidate who should be manufactured by the caucus here; to nominate Electors who should pledge their votes to that candidate, and thus, in truth, to turn the whole affair in that State to a farce or a shadow. This was accomplished by that committee, and so effectually accomplished, that I doubt much whether any man has even thought of asking for whom the Virginia Electors had voted. They were pledged before they were chosen to vote for the caucus candidate, and no man doubts they have redeemed the pledge. Thus in Virginia the legitimacy of caucus nomination has been fully sanctioned; in no other State has the game been played with such unblushing impudence. But by what strange course of reasoning have gentlemen brought themselves to the conclusion that this proposed amendment will prevent the recurrence of these alarming scenes? Vain, and worse than vain, is this effort to restrain a dominant party. Divide the State into districts, will that destroy the caucus? O, no; the men whose interests it may be to preserve the monster, will still protect him. He will laugh at your vain attempts, and again and again trampling down the weak fences of the Constitution, he will, as it shall please him, or rather as it shall please the existing Executive, make and unmake Presidents with the same ease as did the Prætorian cohorts the masters of the Roman world.

Do gentlemen think that districts will be less under the control of a caucus than States? Or that States, when districted, will be less subject to this influence than at present? On the contrary, in proportion as you narrow the territory, the intelligence, the wealth, and the integrity upon which that influence is to operate, do you give force and facility to its operations. Do you believe the future candidates, the future Secretaries of State, will be destitute of the powers of calculation? They will be able to count the districts secured to their influence; and those that are of doubtful or opposite character. In the latter, it will only be necessary to secure a few leading men, and upon them they will bear down with the united influence of a legislative caucus, the patronage of the General Government, and the power and intrigues of the State, in which the districts are situated. Can they fail thus to triumph in any district? Let it not be forgotten, too, that these districts are to be arranged by the States themselves. Will they fail so to arrange them as to give the most ample facility to all this sinister influence?

What is the language of experience upon this subject of districting? Recur a moment to the conduct of the States in the exercise of this very right.

I had, Mr. Chairman, the honor of a seat in the Legislature of New York, when that State was last divided into districts for the purpose of electing members of this House. How were they laid off? With the sole view of returning as many of the supporters of Administration as possible to this House. With that view, counties were cut and slashed in every direction; districts, single, double, and treble, of every shape and of every size, were manufactured; cities were sundered, and the parts whose political character was not of the right sort were connected with counties at the distance of an hundred miles; towns were cut out of the very heart of a county, and annexed to other counties. In short, no device, however shameful, was omitted to obtain the result, and the result was obtained. For, although the great political parties were then nearly balanced in the State, yet so were the districts contrived, and so do they still exist, that not more than six or seven of the twenty-seven Representatives of that State can ever represent the wishes and opinions of the minority. Sir, these facts are notorious. An honorable colleague of mine (Mr. TAYLOR) had then a seat in the New York Legislature, and stood among the leaders of the majority. He, at least, cannot doubt the accuracy of my statement.

Gentlemen have surely heard of the Senatorial districts of Massachusetts; their form, "if form indeed, they had, that shape had none," set all description at defiance. Pictures were drawn of them, and fac similies circulated in the newspapers. They were, indeed, like nothing in the heavens above, in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. No language heretofore invented could give any idea of their peculiar attributes; and the good men of Massachusetts were driven to invent a new political nomenclature to talk about them intelligibly. They were called Gerrymanders, from the name of the gentleman who was then at the head of the faction which produced the shapeless brood. I will mention but one more instance—within the view of this Capitol, any gentleman may behold a practical lesson on this very subject.

For the purpose of electing an Elector of President, the county of Montgomery is most unnaturally separated; a part of it, hitherto of high Federal tone in politics, is annexed to the city of Baltimore; they are connected by a small strip of land, running the whole length of the county of Anne Arundel. Those who know the political character of Montgomery, and that of Baltimore, will be at no loss to find the inducement which led a party to force them into this unnatural alliance.

With these facts in full view, can gentlemen hope any good from their districting plan? Will it prevent future caucussing? Will it prevent State intrigue? Will it secure a fair hearing to the voice of the minority in each State? Will it palsy Executive influence, or prevent Executive interposition? On the contrary, the vilest character of party will be exhibited, in contriving districts to give an undivided party vote. Each district, insulated and unsupported, will become the victim of caucus influence, State intrigue, and Executive patronage.

Mr. Chairman, the source of all these evils is the practice of legislative caucussing; this practice must cease, and with it the evils will vanish; no amendment of the Constitution will effect this desirable object. The Constitution now provides that no member of Congress shall be qualified to vote for a President. Yet, have not the majority of Congress expressly violated the spirit of this prohibition? Have they not, in truth, by this new invention of caucussing, become electors de facto of the Chief Magistrate? True, they only "recommend." Sir, let us not be imposed upon by the juggle of names. Do we not know that this "recommendation," made in solemn convention, signed by chairman and secretary, is tantamount to an election? Has not experience shown beyond the power of cavil, that when the caucus at Washington decides, the business is substantially done, and all that remains is a ceremonious meeting of men chosen and pledged to register in due and Constitutional form the mandate of the caucus? The Constitution, then, is violated; and if a dominant party in the Legislature of the nation can thus openly trample on the charter, and if the delusions of party can prevail on the people to view with applause the proceeding, is it not mere babbling to talk of erecting other Constitutional fences to guard the purity of election?

And who are the gentlemen that urge us to this course? Are they the very statesmen who have broken down the fences of the Constitution and let in this flood of evils upon the country?

And what is the substance of their language? Our fathers framed a scheme of Government wise in all its parts—strong for the protection of our rights; it was the great charter of our liberties, it should have been sacred from violation; to gratify the ambition of one man we tore away one barrier against despotic power. To perpetuate the triumphs of party, we seized with audacious violence the rights deposited in other hands. We violated the spirit of the great charter. We toppled the Constitution from its base. "We introduced a legislative monster, called a caucus, which has devoured our rights, and threatens to trample down our dearest liberties. Come forward, now, you that are innocent of the deed, aid us to restore what our violence has destroyed."

Well, sir, we will do so; but, under pretence of restoring what has been destroyed, we cannot consent to pluck from the Constitution almost its last federative principle. To accomplish the object, it is not necessary to add new patches to the Constitution. This constant tinkering will only produce new evils.

No, sir, let the majority of Congress cease to do evil. Let them scorn to be made the instruments of party, to elevate any man in violation of the Constitution. Let them meet no more in caucus. Give not to the President and his minions that wide field for sinister influence and intrigue. Let the States, as directed by the Constitution, appoint, as it shall please them best, their own Electors, and leave them to perform their duty uninfluenced by any mandates issued from a caucus convened in this Capitol.

Thus, and thus only, sir, can the object be accomplished. When gentlemen are willing to take this patriotic stand against Executive influence and party corruption, the evils of which they complain will vanish, and the Chief Magistrate of this nation will, as in the better times of our Republic, depend on the voice of the people, and not on the voice of a faction, to elevate him to honor and to power.

The debate continued until past three o'clock, when the amendments offered to the original proposition having been rejected, the question was taken on the second and last number of the proposition in the following words:

"A division of the States into districts, for choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and into districts for choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, shall take place, as soon as conveniently may be, after each enumeration and apportionment of Representatives shall be made, which districts shall remain unaltered, until after the succeeding enumeration and apportionment of Representatives.

And decided as follows: For the clause 87, against it 51.

There being a sufficient majority to carry the question into Committee of the Whole, but not sufficient to sanction the proposition eventually, the consent of two-thirds of both Houses being necessary, the Committee rose and reported the resolution to the House.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, proposed further amendments; when the whole subject was laid on the table.

MONDAY, December 23.

Two other members, to wit: from North Carolina, WILLIAM H. MURFREE, and from Georgia, WILSON LUMPKIN, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Bank of the Metropolis; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Elections, reported the sufficiency of the credentials of the following new members who have taken their seats: W. P. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania; THOMAS M. NELSON, and JOHN TYLER, of Virginia.

On motion of Mr. CHAPPELL, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the several laws which bar from settlement and payment the claims against the Government, denominated,

Loan office certificates,
Indents for interest on the public debt,
Final settlement certificates,
Commissioner's certificates,
Army commissioner's certificates,
Credits given in lieu of Army certificates cancelled, Credits for the pay of the Army for which no certificates were issued, and Invalid pensions.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, I transmit to them the proceedings of the Commissioner appointed under the act "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," as reported by the Commissioner to the Department of War.

DECEMBER 21, 1816.

Some rather desultory debate took place on a motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, to have the report printed for the use of the House; which was objected to by some as being wholly unnecessary; and by others advocated, not only as being necessary, but as being almost a matter of course. The debate culminated in a decision in favor of printing the report.

Mr. TAUL, of Kentucky, then moved to discharge the committee of investigation, into this subject, from its further consideration, with a view to bring the subject generally before the House; which motion was negatived.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, moved to take up the bill for the establishment of a National University; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, called up one of the bills reported by the Military Committee. Both motions were negatived.

tee on Foreign Relations, reported the following bill:

An Act concerning the navigation of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the — day of — no goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be imported into the United States, from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt a similar regulation of commerce.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, or merchandise, imported into the United States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and the ship or vessel wherein the same shall be imported, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; and such goods, wares, or merchandise, ship, or vessel, and cargo, shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in like manner, and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions, as have been heretofore established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States, by the several revenue laws.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the same committee, also reported a bill supplementary to the act regulating the duties on imports and tonnage, passed 27th of April 1816.

These two bills were twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

SUPREME COURT.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to provide for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. [To pay a salary to the Reporter appointed by the Court, provided the decisions of the Court should be published within six months after the adjournment of the Court, and a certain number of copies thereof delivered to the office of State.] The bill was committed.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, reported the following bill:

A bill authorizing the appointment of Circuit Judges, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted &c., That, from and after the — day of — next, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall cease to be Judges of the Circuit Courts of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the — day of — next, in lieu of the term now established by law, the Supreme Court of the United States shall be holden at the Seat of Government on the first Monday of December of every year.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the present Circuit Courts, there shall be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States, a Judge to be called a Circuit Judge, who shall, together with the District Judge, hold the circuit courts in the respective districts within his circuit and who shall have and possess all the rights, powers, authority, and perform the duties which by law now devolve upon or may be executed by the Justices of the Supreme Courts, as Judges of the Circuit Courts, within their respective circuits. And each of the said Circuit Judges shall receive, as an annual salary or compensation for his services during his continuance in office, the sum of — dollars, payable quarter-yearly at the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was twice read and committed.

NEW STATE PROPOSED.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the select committee appointed on the 9th instant, on the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying for admission into the Union as a State, made a detailed report, which was read; when Mr. L. reported a bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next. The report is as follows:

The Mississippi Territory contains, according to a census lately taken under an act of the Legislature, and furnished by the Secretary of the said Territory, 75,512 souls; of whom 45,085 are free white persons, 356 free people of color, and 30,061 slaves. By the articles of agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia, it is stipulated that this Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State when it shall contain 60,000 free inhabitants, or at an earlier period if Congress shall deem it expedient. Hence, it appears that its admission at this time depends, not upon the claim derived from the above-mentioned agreement with Georgia, but upon a liberal policy on the part of the United States. It would seem to be superfluous in your committee to recommend that considerations of a deficiency of numbers be waived in this case, seeing that the House of Representatives have passed three bills, at different periods, for the admission of this Territory, when its population was much smaller than it is at this time.

But it becomes a question whether the object of the memorialists can be ultimately attained, or ought to be attained, in the way in which it is asked. It will be readily perceived that your committee allude to the objection to the extent of the Territory in question, which the memorialists pray may be embraced within the limits of a single State. Whether such a measure might, in any possible contingency, affect the general interest of the Union, it is possible that a difference of sentiment may exist. Your committee presume that it is not required of them to discuss this question, as it is one on which every member of the House will form an opinion for himself. They will, however, beg leave barely to remark, that they cannot believe a State of such unprecedented magnitude as the one contemplated by the memorialists can be desirable to any section of the United States. In relation to the interest of the Territory itself, it may be more within the province of your committee to give their opinion, with the facts upon which it is formed.

It is deemed unnecessary to calculate how many square miles, or how many millions of acres, the Mississippi Territory contains, as its size is sufficiently apparent from a mere glance at the map. But there are other circumstances of a local nature which are not so obvious to the House, and which, therefore, the committee will proceed to state.

H. of R.

New State Proposed.

DECEMBER, 1816.

There are in this Territory three principal settlements, which lie, as to their relative positions, somewhat in a triangular form, viz : one, immediately below the thirty-fifth degree of latitude, on the Tennessee river; another, immediately above the thirty-first degree, on the Mississippi; and the other, also immediately above the thirty-first degree, on the Mobile. From the settlement on the Tennessee to that on the Mississippi, the distance is about four hundred miles, all of which is a wilderness, excepting so far as it is settled by the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, by whom these immense regions are claimed. From the settlement on the Mississippi to that on the Mobile, the distance is nearly three hundred miles. Here the Indian claim is extinguished; but the intermediate settlements from Pearl river, eastwardly, are insulated and of small extent. From the settlement on the Mobile to that on the Tennessee, the distance is about three hundred miles also; and here, too, the Indian claims are now extinguished to the whole of this extensive and interesting tract of country, which will, no doubt, soon exhibit a flourishing settlement, extending from the Tennessee river to the Gulf of Mexico. Between the Tennessee and the Mississippi settlements, and between the Mississippi and the Mobile settlements, there is not, and probably never will be, any commercial intercourse whatever; but between the Mobile and the Tennessee settlements, such an intercourse cannot fail to take place when the intervening country shall be settled, and its fine navigable streams explored and improved.

The whole Mississippi Territory formed into a single State would not only be very inconvenient to a vast majority of those of its inhabitants whose duty or interest might call them to the Seat of Government, but would also prove, in the opinion of your committee, too extensive for its Executive to suppress internal disorders in all parts, and repel external invasions at all points, with necessary promptness, energy, and effect. But another objection to an entire admission of the Territory arises from the want of a continuity of settlement and a reciprocity of interest between its distant parts. The former of these defects might, perhaps, be merely inconvenient; but the latter could not fail to be a permanent source of real evil to the legislative councils of the country, and, of consequence, to the community at large. Your committee need not express their apprehensions in detail, as the House will readily conceive how naturally jealousies would arise, and collisions ensue, amongst the representatives of a people inhabiting different regions, having distinct local interests, and entertaining opposite views. There is much cause to fear that, in such a state of things, sectional feelings would prevail over principles of justice, and local policy over the general good.

From the above view of the subject, your committee are of opinion that the Mississippi Territory should be divided by a north and south line, for the purpose of erecting the same into two separate and independent States. In proposing this measure, they feel no little reluctance in doing it, in opposition to the wishes of a great portion of the people of the Territory; and this reluctance would be more difficult to overcome, but for the consideration that there is, on the other hand, a great portion also of the same people who are in favor of the measure proposed. This is, probably, a question on which these people would never agree amongst themselves; and hence the necessity of the parental interposition of the General Government to decide it for them in such a way as may be best adapted to their local interests, and not incompatible with the interest of the United States. But, in recommending a division of this Territory, your committee beg leave to suggest such a plan of division as will not probably retard the admission of either part beyond the period at which its inhabitants would be entitled to a State government, in virtue of the agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia.

As there is already west of the line of division which will be proposed a population that would be entitled to one Representative in Congress, on the federal principle of representation, and according to the present apportionment, your committee respectfully recommend the immediate admission of this western part of the Territory, and the establishment of a separate Territorial Government for the eastern part, until it also may be entitled, on the same principle, to the rights of a State.

With respect to the line of division, it is natural that the citizens of the Territory should, according to their respective local situations, entertain a variety of conflicting opinions, and cherish a diversity of opposite hopes. It was a question of some difficulty with your committee; and their decision is the result of a disposition to do equal justice to the present inhabitants, to provide for the convenience of future settlers, and to promote the interest of the whole. The line which the committee propose for the consideration of the House is designated in the two bills which they have prepared for the purposes herein recommended, and which they ask leave to report.

Mr. LATTIMORE also reported a bill to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

DECEMBER, 1816. Internal Improvement—Vaccination—Soldiers' Orphans.

H OF R.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported the following bill:

A Bill to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvements, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States share of its dividends.

Be it enacted, &c., That the United States' share of the dividends of the National Bank, and the bonus for its charter, be and the same are hereby set apart and permanently pledged as a fund for constructing roads and canals; and that it be subject to such specific appropriations, in that respect, as Congress may hereafter make.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said fund be put under the care of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being; and that it shall be his duty, unless otherwise directed, to vest the said dividends, if not specifically appropriated by Congress, in the stock of the United States; which stock shall accrue to, and is hereby constituted a part of said fund for constructing of roads and canals.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said Secretary, unless otherwise directed, to vest the bonus for the charter of the said bank, as it may fall due, in the stock of the United States; and also to lay before Congress, at their annual session, the condition of the said fund.

The bill was twice read and committed.

VACCINATION.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill further to encourage vaccination.

[The bill prescribes certain duties to be performed by the agent for vaccination, such as furnishing matter and instructions to the Army and Navy, and annually to every post office in the United States; and provides that the agent shall for his services receive a salary from the Government.]

The bill passed on without debate, until that part of the bill came under consideration, which designates the amount of the salary to be allowed to the agent.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to fix the salary at $2,000; Mr. HAHN, of Pennsylvania, moved $1,500; and Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, 1,000.

The question having been taken on $2,000 was decided in the negative.

Messrs. COMSTOCK, of New York, WOODWARD, of South Carolina, CONDUCT, and SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, supported $1,500, at some length, by arguments having reference to the labor and great importance of the services required; and Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, opposed it, on the ground of its being more than sufficient compensation for an officer who could at the same time pursue his own profession. Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, also supported $1,500, in a decided speech, grounded on the incessant care and labor, and arduous duties, to be devolved on this officer.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to fix the salary at $1,800. This motion was negatived by a small majority.

The question was taken on $1,500, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, then moved to amend the bill so as to add an allowance "for stationery and printing, provided the same do not exceed one hundred and fifty dollars." Negatived.

After some further proceedings, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, December 24.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to authorize the importers of any goods, wares, and merchandise, brought from any foreign port or place into the port of New Orleans, and destined for Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, to give bond for the payment of the duties on such goods, wares, and merchandise, made payable to the collector to be appointed at Cincinnati; which bonds shall specify the usual terms of credit, to commence from the time of arrival, on delivery of such merchandise at that place; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Henry Malcolm, to which Committee of the Whole had also been committed, the "bill directing the discharge of John Ricaud from imprisonment," and the "bill directing the discharge of Nathaniel Taft from imprisonment."

The bills were reported without amendment.

The bill first mentioned was ordered to lie upon the table, and the two latter to be engrossed and read the third time on Thursday next.

The bill for the relief of William Haslett, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed, for a third reading.

Some time was spent in discussing the bill directing the opening a road from Reynoldsburg in Tennessee; and, after it had progressed, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, after a considerable debate, it was ordered to lie on the table. [Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. CALHOUN, and others, advocated the motion to lay the bill on the table, on the ground that it would be improper to act specially on any particular road, whilst a general bill on the subject was yet likely to pass at the session. By Messrs. McLEAN, of Kentucky, REYNOLDS, ROBERTSON, and HARDIN, the particular friends of the bill, the motion was strongly opposed, on the ground that the road did not come under the general class of roads and other internal improvements, being one of necessity, no road now existing there, and being indispensable to enable the boatmen from New Orleans, and others to return home by anything like a direct track.]

EDUCATION OF SOLDIERS' ORPHANS.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, rose to propose an inquiry into the expediency of a measure, which, if adopted, would tend to make the institution for military education at West Point more honorable, and perhaps more useful to the nation. He did not mean to enter at all into the course pursued in regard to that academy, either as it respected the Government or the persons employed: but as the institution exists, he meant to make a proposition, which would render it more creditable to the United States than it is at present, however well managed. If youths were to be educated at the public expense, Mr. R. said he should like to see some rule established by which those should receive this privilege who had some claim to it. He did not wish the institution to be filled by the sons of the influential and the wealthy only.

H. OF R.

Vaccination.

DECEMBER, 1816.

He should greatly prefer a moderate degree of education, to be equally diffused among all the members of the community, to any excess, in the possession of a few: he would rather that every man in the nation should understand his native language, and a few of the necessary rules of arithmetic, than that literature, of however high degree, should be exclusively possessed by some dozens of persons, scattered over the United States. It appeared to him, that by establishing institutions as now contemplated, we began at the wrong end of society. The erection of such institutions rather shows the ostentation of the Government than its benevolence or wisdom—remarks, however, which, he said, belonged to a question which might arise during the session, but was not now before the House.

On reflecting on the question who were best entitled to notice from their Government, the mind was at once struck with the impression, that there is one class peculiarly entitled to its justice and favor. He alluded to the sons of those who had fallen in the service of their country. Having been thus deprived of their parents, they ought to find in society a father. If any class was entitled to peculiar favor from the country, it was the sons of those who had died in the public service, leaving to their children the inheritance of their bravery and their poverty. It becomes us, said Mr. R., to relieve them from the ignorance and immorality which their situation entails on them, stripped as they are of the essential support which others find in parents who guide and direct their steps. I cannot bear the idea, said Mr. R., that money should be taken from the pockets, even of the indigent, to educate the sons of men of wealth, especially when we find those to whom I have alluded pining in want. I do not know that the sons of the wealthy do fill the academy; I have not inquired, but I hope the fact is not so; that such are not nourished from the public breast, without attention to the claims of others more deserving the public care. Far from me, said he, be the desire to establish any privileged class in this country; before I would consent to do anything so repugnant to my principles, I would forego feelings the most dear to me. He did not consider the motion he was about to make as proposing it; as there was to be no order, no rank, nor anything which could offend the most rigid Republican. Nor did he think that we should run much risk of inducing fathers to shed their blood too freely for the country, that they might have their sons educated by the public; but, on the other hand, said he, let us take from them one of their fears; for they know that, in battle, the ball that deprives them of existence, takes from their sons what is dearer to them, all prospect of education and correct morals. Under these impressions, Mr. R. said, he ventured to propose the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of educating, in the Military School at West Point, the sons of all officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, who have fallen in the late war, fighting the battles of their country.

Mr. TALLMADGE, of Connecticut, suggested to the honorable mover the expediency of modifying the terms of his motion, so as that, if more academies should be created, all might stand on the same footing.

To which Mr. ROBERTSON consented; and also, at the suggestion of Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, so modified his motion as to strike out the words "in the late war," so as to make the terms general.

The resolve was then agreed to without opposition.

VACCINATION.

The engrossed bill supplementary to an act for the encouragement of vaccination, was read a third time.

Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, required the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. Although he believed he should himself vote for the bill, he thought it proper that on a bill for the establishment of a salary officer, the people should know who voted for and who against the bill; and he also wished that their constituents should know who were at this time present, and who absent from their seats.

Mr. CADY, of New York, opposed the passage of the bill, as contemplating an interference by the United States in the duty of the States. He had never heard, he said, that the State of New York, or any other State, had been so unmindful of the health of the people, as that Congress ought to take it into their charge. So far as respected the Army and Navy, the United States ought to act on the subject; but, for the rest, it ought to be left to the State Legislatures.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved that the bill should lie on the table. So far from availing themselves of the opportunity of the House being thin, to take the yeas and nays, to show who were not in their seats, if that consideration operated at all, it should be not to take the yeas and nays but to postpone the decision of the question.

The bill was laid on the table; and the House adjourned to Thursday.

THURSDAY, December 26.

Mr. KING presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Lincoln county, in the District of Maine, complaining of the advantages enjoyed by British vessels over vessels of the United States, in the commerce carried on between Great Britain and the United States, and praying that such measures may be adopted as will secure to the shipping interest of this country the advantages to which they conceive it to be entitled, or shall remedy the evils of which they complain.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Delafield, reported a bill for the relief of John Delafield, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

A message was received from the President of the United States recommending to the consideration of Congress the expediency of such further legislative provisions as may be requisite for detaining vessels actually equipped, or in a course of equipment, with a warlike force, within the jurisdiction of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on Military Affairs were directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to establish a manufactory of small arms near Newport, in Kentucky, on Licking river.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a sum of money to be expended, under the direction of the President of the United States, in removing the obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river, created by the falls near Louisville, in Kentucky.

Mr. DESHA submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, As the lands south of Green river, now within the limits of the State of Kentucky, were, by the State of Virginia, set apart for the purpose of satisfying claims for Revolutionary services, and a portion of which lands has since been, by the General Government, ceded by treaty to the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, by which cession many of the Revolutionary patriots have been deprived of the benefit arising from grants obtained for meritorious services; that the President of the United States be requested to take the necessary steps to have the Indian title to the land lying within the limits of the State of Kentucky extinguished as soon as practicable.

Mr. CALHOUN thought, as the resolution was on a subject new, and somewhat local in its nature, it would be better not to decide on it immediately, and moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. HARDIN, also, joined in the hope that the resolution should lie on the table, as it stated facts with which he was before unacquainted, and which required some examination.

Mr. DESHA, after repeating his belief in the necessity and propriety of the resolution, acquiesced in the motion to lay it, at present, on the table; and it was accordingly so ordered.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The engrossed bills, directing the discharge of Nathaniel Taft from his imprisonment, and for the discharge of John Ricaud from imprisonment, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of William Haslett, was read the third time, when Mr. HARDIN, who was not satisfied of the justice of the relief contemplated, and the chairman of the committee which reported the bill not being in his seat to give the information he desired, moved to lay the bill on the table; and, after some conversation on the subject, between Messrs. HARDIN, LYON, DAVENPORT, and WRIGHT, on the circumstances which brought the petitioner before the House for relief, and the propriety of suspending the immediate passage of the bill, it was laid on the table.

SUPREME COURT REPORTS.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the regular publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to fill the blank for the salary of the reporter with the sum of one thousand dollars; and supported his motion and the general object of the bill by a short speech.

Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the first section of the bill—in effect to reject it.

This motion, and the preceding one, gave rise to a debate of some length; Messrs. TAYLOR of New York, H. NELSON, and ROOT, in favor of the bill; and Messrs. ROBERTSON, HARDIN, ROSS, and WRIGHT, in opposition to it.

In support of the measure proposed by the bill, was urged the great importance of having correct and early reports of the decisions of a court whose decrees, if not law in themselves, are evidence of the law, and the advantage of a reporter of proper abilities, made responsible for the proper exercise of his duties. This bill, it was strongly urged, would tend to secure a prompt publication of the reports, making the salary contingent on the delivery of a certain number of copies of the reports of each term, within six months after the decisions of the court were pronounced; and that it would also secure fidelity in the reporter, he being liable to removal by the Supreme Court, for misconduct. Without an inducement like that proposed by the bill, fears were expressed that no reports would be published; and the example of some of the States was quoted, who had deemed the publication of the decisions of their Supreme Courts, so important as to give to men properly qualified, even a greater compensation than was proposed to be given to a reporter of the decisions of a higher court.

On the other hand, the value of correct reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court was generally admitted; though Mr. ROBERTSON was opposed to any act which should sanction the idea of their having a permanent effect over other law, or make their construction of laws binding on their successors and on other authorities. It was generally urged, in opposition to the bill, that no necessity existed for creating a salary officer for this purpose; that the reports had been heretofore published without a salary, and would, if promptly published, afford emolument enough to secure the attention of adequate talents to that object; that, to pass such a bill, would be to give a monopoly of a privilege, (that of reporting the proceedings of the Court,) which ought to be free to all. As to the State courts, it was said, a salary reporter might be necessary, since the demand for the reports, limited to the State, would be necessarily small, though their publication was highly important to a correct administration of justice; but that, in regard to the decisions of the Supreme Court, whose effect pervaded the Union, the case was otherwise; and there could be no doubt but the publication would afford sufficient emolument, unaided by a salary, from the extensive sale of the reports.

H. OF R.

Payment for Lost Property.

DECEMBER, 1816.

To the latter argument it was rejoined, that though the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States were more general in their effect than those of the State courts, they were more limited in their scope; limited pretty much to questions of national law, or general law, of which few even of eminent legal men had occasion to avail themselves in practice.

The question on the striking out of the section was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 76 to about 40.

The Committee rose and reported their decision; which was concurred in by the House, (the call of Mr. ROOF for the yeas and nays having been refused,) by about the same vote. The bill is therefore rejected.

FRIDAY, December 27.

Two other members, to wit: from the State of New York, THOMAS R. GOLD and MOSS KENT, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying off and establishing a separate surveyor's district within the Mississippi Territory, adjoining the Southern boundary of the State of Tennessee, and including the late purchases made from the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians, and to provide for the appointment of a principal surveyor for the said district; also, a register and receiver of public moneys; and make such further provision as may be necessary to have the lands within the same, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, surveyed, and offered for sale, as soon as it is practicable.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the Committee on Military Affairs was instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act, making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes, passed April 6, 1816, as to require a relinquishment of land bounty on the part of the heirs and representatives of volunteers, enlisted under the act authorizing the President of the United States to accept and organize certain volunteer military corps, passed February 6, 1812, previous to placing the widows or children of said volunteers upon the pension list, under the first-mentioned act.

Mr. KERR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of passing a law, authorizing the soldiers of the army to transfer their claims to bounty land before the patents are issued.

On this resolution, some discussion took place, in which Messrs. KERR, HARRISON, HULBERT, WRIGHT, PARRIS, SMITH of Maryland, and JOHNSON of Kentucky, took part. The motion was finally withdrawn by the mover, in consequence of his discovering that the Senate had asked of the Executive information on this subject, and that it was already comprehended in a general reference to a committee of this House. Mr. KERR intimated that he should hereafter urge his motion, if the subject was not brought before the House for decision, by a committee, or in some other shape.

Mr. THOMAS, of Tennessee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating twenty thousand dollars for the improvement of the navigation of the Muscle Shoals, in the Mississippi Territory.

The House agreed to consider the motion; and on the question of adopting the resolution, it was, without debate, decided in the negative. So it was rejected.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House, on motion of Mr. HARDIN, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act of last session, authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed in the military service, during the late war.

The first section of the bill having been read, which goes to repeal certain sections of the former act—

Mr. CLARK, of New York, moved to strike out therefrom the word ninth, so as to retain the section of the law (proposed to be stricken out) authorizing payment for houses destroyed by the enemy, in consequence of their occupation as places of military deposite.

Mr. HARDIN stated that the motive which induced the committee to recommend the striking out of that section, did not proceed from an objection to the satisfaction of such claims, but to the decision thereon being placed at the disposal of one commissioner, or officer of any description. It was the opinion of the Committee that such claims ought to pass specially before Congress. Nine-tenths of the aggregate amount of money paid under the awards of the Commissioner of Claims, had been under the ninth section of the act. There were claims in the Commissioner's office, coming under that section of the act, yet undecided on, to the amount of something like half a million of dollars. This was a sum too large to be allowed to claimants but by special acts of Congress, certainly too large to be subjected to the decision of one man, whose award was decisive, fixed, and unalterable.

Mr. BETTS, of New York, moved that the Committee should rise. The report of the Commissioner had been laid on the table from the printer's only this morning, and he had had no opportunity to examine it. The House might, perhaps, after a perusal of the report and documents, not be disposed to amend the act at all. They certainly ought to understand the subject before they acted on it.

Mr. HARDIN trusted, he said, that the Committee would not rise. The decisions of the Commissioner had been suspended on every section of the act in question, and could not be resumed until Congress should act on the subject. As to the document the gentleman had spoken of, it was, Mr. H. said, nothing more than an elementary treatise, drawn up by Mr. Lee, or somebody else for him, which he suspected was the fact—a learned treatise on the construction of statutes. Mr. H. said he had rather be moving some way or other on this subject, even if wrongly, than that the act should be kept wholly in suspense.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, was in favor of the Committee's rising, and was proceeding to assign his reasons—

When the Chairman said, the nature of the question (on the Committee's rising) precluded debate, except on that point.

The question on the Committee's rising was determined in the negative—68 to 53.

The question recurred on Mr. CLARK's motion for striking out the word "ninth."

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, spoke in favor of the motion. Those who had claims in his part of the country, under the act passed at the last session, had prepared the evidence in support of them, in the manner pointed out by the Commissioner; and only yesterday an agent, sent on by them with these claims, arrived in this city. Why, Mr. R. asked, should a different measure of justice be afforded to citizens in different sections of the country? Why should his constituents, by a repeal of this section of the act, be deprived of the advantages of which others nearer the Seat of Government had availed themselves? Or why should claims of one description continue to be paid, while claims of another sort, depending on the same principle, were to be dragged before the House? The numerous applications for indemnification for losses had made it necessary to appoint a Commissioner to decide on them; and claims for lost horses, teams, &c., were still to be subject to summary decision; while claims equally just, resting on the same principle, because they differed in amount, were to come before this House, and if they were obliged to do so, they would be subjected to great loss, and encounter much delay and further expense. And, he said, when gentlemen from the Western country should have gotten their claims settled before the Commissioner or other officer, whatever the liberality and fairness with which they generally act, for which he gave them credit, there would not be the same inducement to pay claims for other property; and he ventured to say, if the claims for houses burnt belonged to that section of the country, the House would never have heard of one mode of paying for claims of one character, and another mode for other claims depending on the same principle. Mr. R. said he had thought it necessary, representing alone on this floor a particular section of the country, to oppose the attempt to place those who have suffered losses in that quarter, in an infinitely worse situation than that in which they now stood. What would be the impression made on the minds of those people when they found property in one part of the country paid for, and the same payment refused to them? It would be, that there was an attention to the interests of those near the Seat of Government, and of those numerously represented, which those otherwise situated need not look for. He hoped the ninth section would not be repealed. If the Commissioner was not a fit person to decide on the claims, and of his fitness he did not know; and therefore would not say anything—let another be selected. It was peculiarly ungracious at this moment to shut the door against his constituents, Mr. R. said, and to decide that this section of the act having answered particular purposes, it was unnecessary to continue it longer. As to throwing the claimants on Congress, every one could see the difficulty of obtaining attention to minute claims, and the small prospect which the claimants must have of obtaining that deliberate consideration of their claims which justice requires.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, believed the old law ought to remain unaltered, unless by the addition of two Commissioners to the one already appointed. The Congress had, in a particular case, appointed three Commissioners to decide on the merit of claims not more difficult, nor perhaps more important, than those confided by the act of last session to one Commissioner—he meant the Yazoo claims. The idea of a single Commissioner had been objected to in the Senate at the last session; they desired three Commissioners. This House decided in favor of one. And why now undo that which was last year so deliberately done? Would any man here say that houses burnt by the enemy, because in military possession or occupation, ought not to be paid for? A man might blush for his country, if such an opinion were recorded as its act. If we cross the Canada line, he said, we find that Government making payment for losses of every description sustained by its citizens. The proposition to repeal the ninth section of the act of last session, Mr. W. said, contemplated injustice to the small States. How did they now stand in this respect? The gentleman from Louisiana was the single Representative of a part of the country which had in this respect greatly suffered. Look at the proceedings of every day, Mr. W. said, and injustice to the small States would appear in the votes of the House. He protested totis viribus against it. If there was any fault in regard to the law of last session—and he did not say there was—it was in the selection of a man for Commissioner who wanted judgment; for he never heard him even suspected of a disposition to do otherwise than right. If the records now in possession of this House were temperately examined, Mr. W. said he believed they would present a very different view of this matter from that which gentlemen had hastily taken up. Let us appoint two additional Commissioners, said he, and that will be a sufficient amendment to the law. There were, he said, many cases waiting now, which ought to be paid; which this House had said ought to be paid, which it was now desired they should unsay, and leave the decisions on the claims to a body, the members of which, to say the least of it, respected their own constituents much more than they did others. He knew it to be so, he said; he had seen it every day; and no gentleman would rise and say that they were not more ready to attend to the wants of their constituents than to those of a distant region. Mr. W. said he was not prepared to denounce the present Commissioner, or legislate him out of office. Let him be heard; let his acts be examined before they are judged. As to reference of claims coming under the ninth section to this House, Mr. W. said it was impossible they could be fully examined here; and, if they could, it would be vastly more expensive, one day's sitting of this House costing the nation as much as a year's salary of a Commissioner. Mr. W. complained that his constituents, who were exposed by their situations, who did not live beyond the mountains, who fought at the water's edge, and had their vessels and houses burnt, were to be deprived of the benefits of the provisions of a law, which Congress had at the last session solemnly decided to be proper and right to be applied to their case. He hoped the House would confirm now what they had done at the last session, and not repeal a law because its provisions had, in the execution of it, been more widely extended than was thought proper. But, Mr. W. said, he did not believe there had in this case been as great a clamor against Mr. Lee's construction of the law, as there had been against that of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Aaron Burr. He hoped the House would make short work of it, and reject this bill. Mr. W. went on to state his opinion that the conduct of the Government in regard to individual losses by the war ought to be graduated by the most liberal principles, and that all property ought to be paid for destroyed by the enemy in consequence of the presence of military force. On the exposed Atlantic frontier, in many cases houses had been destroyed by the enemy because occupied by the militia, sometimes with and sometimes without the owner's consent. Would gentlemen arrest the payment of such claims, or throw them on the benignity of this House, after they had been paid for their horses? He should move an amendment, he said, at the proper time, to appoint two additional Commissioners, with an appeal, if the House choose, in doubtful cases, to any body vested with appellate jurisdiction, even if it were the Supreme Court.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, assured the gentleman from Maryland that he, though from the West, was as much opposed to the bill as the gentleman himself could be; and he begged the gentleman from Maryland to believe that there were some gentlemen in the West, as willing to provide for the payment for burnt houses as for lost horses—who made no distinction between the losses of different sections in a common cause. Mr. H. wished to strike out the whole bill, and to propose a substitute, which, not expecting the bill to be called up to-day, since the documents were only just laid on the table, he had not time to prepare. If the Committee would rise, he could prepare one.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose to propose an amendment to the bill which he had prepared. He did not mean now to enter into a discussion, in which, if such should arise on this subject, he should think it his duty to take up a small portion of the time of the House, but not at this hour of the day, or at this time of the week. He could show, when it became necessary, that, so far from any occasion to amend the law, unless to extend its provisions, the English language could not make the law more definite, or embrace more distinctly principles which have been solemnly sanctioned by this House, and he was certain would be by this nation—principles which no American Congress would ever refuse to sanction. For the present, he should content himself with submitting his proposition, convinced that all would be satisfied, and even the Commissioner himself, with a subjection of his decisions, besides the general control of the Executive, to the revision of one of the Heads of Departments. Independent of other considerations, he said, a strong reason against the abolition of the office of Commissioner was, the time it would take to organize and put in motion a new office, new books, &c. The present Commissioner knew the views of the Executive, and would not only be as adequate, but more prompt than any other individual who could be selected, &c. Mr. J. then submitted his motion to strike the whole of the bill from the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"That in all cases arising under the provisions of an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment for property lost or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' the decisions of the Commissioner shall be revised and sanctioned by the Secretary of the Treasury; without which sanction, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States to satisfy any such claims; and at the next session of Congress, the said Secretary shall make report of such cases as may not be embraced by said act, but which, in his opinion, should be provided for by law."

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again; and Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, December 30.

Another member, to wit: from the State of New Hampshire, BRADBURY CILLEY, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the said Territory may be erected into a State government, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition from sundry members of the Legislature of the said Territory, praying that the Territory may be divided into two equal parts, and that the western section may be erected into a State government, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House, on the bill to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government.

Mr. SCOTT presented sundry resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, requesting Congress to adopt some more enlarged and liberal principle respecting the confirmation of land titles in the said Territory; to extend the time allowed for recording land titles; to establish two additional land offices for the sale of public lands; and that the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands in said Territory may be extended.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CONDIOT, from the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, reported in part a list of thirty-seven bills, remaining unfinished at the close of the last session, in various stages of progress.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, (now called the Real Estate Bank,) and for other purposes; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a detailed report on the petition of Thomas J. Allen, representative of William H. Allen, late commander of the United States' brig Argus, and the surviving officers and crew of that vessel, &c., concluding with a resolution unfavorable to the petitioners. The report and resolution were, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion of Mr. H. NELSON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of further extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the General Land Office; and also of further extending the time to complete the surveys, and obtain the patents for lands located under Virginia resolution warrants; with leave to report by bill or otherwise. And Mr. H. NELSON, Mr. CREIGHTON, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. DICKENS, and Mr. SHEFFEX, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting such restrictions as will be calculated to prevent the formation of companies to monopolize the public lands in the Mississippi Territory.

TRANSFER OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of an act, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," passed the 3d of March, 1809, as authorizes the President of the United States to transfer appropriations.

Mr. C. supported the propriety of his motion by remarking briefly on the evils—great evils, he said—which resulted to the public interests from the practice, particularly in the War Department, of permitting funds to be diverted from one object of appropriation and applied to another. He urged the necessity of applying a remedy, and that was to compel in the Departments a rigid adherence to specific appropriations.

After some observations from Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, SMITH of Maryland, LOWMEES, and PICKERING, respectively, principally explanatory of the present and former practice of the Departments, but generally acquiescing in the propriety of inquiry—the resolution was agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act for authorizing payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, in the military service of the United States. The question being on Mr. JOHNSON's motion, to amend the bill so as to continue the law as it stands, subjecting the decisions of the Commissioner to the revision of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, after drawing a comparison between the bill and the amendment, contended that it was indispensable, in his opinion, that the 9th section of the act in question, should be repealed.* The claims under it, he said, were of great magnitude; and how easy would it be for claimants, with large claims, as soon as they ascertained what sort of evidence was wanting, to procure this evidence. Was it not better, was it not safer, he asked, that such claims should be specially submitted to the consideration of the Congress of the United States, than to the decision of any single individual? On that ground, and on that alone, he said he was clearly in favor of repealing the 9th section of the bill. He would not advert, at this moment, to several cases to

* As this section is the principal bone of contention, it is thought proper to bring its terms partially to the reader's recollection, as follows:

"SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any person who, in the time aforesaid, has sustained damage by the destruction of his or her house or building by the enemy, while the same was occupied as a military deposit, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the amount of such damage: Provided, It shall appear that such occupation was the cause of its destruction."

show with what facility testimony can be procured, when it was known what sort of testimony would answer the purposes of the claimants. A commissioner, he said, might not feel himself authorized to inquire into the credibility of testimony in the same manner as Congress would. As to the allegation made of the indisposition of Congress to examine and pass claims, Mr. Y. said, he would not entertain the idea that Congress would not authorize the payment of proper claims. It would be safer, he concluded by saying, to vest the management of this business in the hands of Congress, than in those of any set of officers whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that without attributing to this House any dereliction of duty, he must persist in his opinion, that any class of claims might be more properly confided to a judicial tribunal than to the Congress of the United States. If the House was, from its constitution, unable, properly, to sift one claim, how could they properly examine and decide on many? Congress never act (except in cases of exception) in a judicial character. What, said he, one hundred and eighty individuals act as a judicial body, to determine the force, and validity of testimony in numerous cases! The thing was impracticable. In relation to the impression which had gone abroad in regard to claims under the act of last session, one would suppose, Mr. J. said, that the Treasury was to be exhausted by them; that the wealth of the Indies would not satisfy the demands on the Treasury. What was the amount of claims likely to be paid, which had created this alarm? He would venture to say that the aggregate amount that would be paid, would not exceed a million of dollars. Was it to have been expected, he asked, that we should pass through a war of two years and eight months, in which every description of force was employed against a powerful enemy, with a less cost than that for just claims of this description? Under the most liberal construction of the act, embracing the cases of losses on the Niagara frontier, on the bosom of the Chesapeake, at New Orleans, the whole amount would not be a million and a half of dollars. Congress had solemnly declared, by their act, that certain cases of losses should be paid for; and what was it now proposed to do? To repeal the act—to violate the promise. His friend from Maryland was mistaken, Mr. J. said, in supposing that the horse cases had been all passed; and he was equally so in supposing that he (Mr. J.) or any of his colleagues, if those claims had been satisfied, would deprive that gentleman's constituents of just indemnity for their losses. He felt no alarm, he said, at the prospect of payment of all such claims as were properly supported. He was willing that the present Commissioner should act under the Secretary of the Treasury; and the present Secretary was the same person who, in the Department of War, had limited the construction of the 9th section of the act; so that he presumed gentlemen who favored a rigid construction of the law, could not object to his agency being employed. As to referring claimants to this House, Mr. J. said, we know, when a case of the least importance is before us, how difficult it is to obtain a hearing in this House. Who, indeed, examined as they ought the claims presented to this House? Would any gentleman consult his conscience, and say, that amidst the other duties of his station, he could do justice to the cases presented to him? If there was one who would undertake it, Mr. J. said he should be glad to see that member. And what were the class of cases which were to be placed on this precarious fate, because they ought to be trusted to this House only? They were not donations—the allowance of them was no act of charity, scarcely of liberality. They rested on the principle that the property destroyed was in the military service or occupation of the United States, without any participation of the owner in its loss or destruction, and without any act of omission or commission on his part giving rise to it. The claims rested on the eternal principles of justice—one of which was, that individual property destroyed, through the agency of the Government, ought to be paid for. And shall we, said he, because there has been an alarm excited about two or three cases, prostrate that principle, the recognition of which has been the cause of so much credit to the present Congress? He was very happy, he said, that no gentleman had contended that the cases provided for in the act of last session ought not to be paid. As to the horse claims, as they were called, he was glad also that their justice was not questioned. The whole amount of claims from the Western country under that act, he said, was less than a hundred thousand dollars; and who would begrudge the payment of that amount to those who had lost their property, under the circumstances of no fault on their part, &c.? To their honor among generations yet unborn, Congress had agreed to reimburse such losses; he hoped they would not refuse to extend the same principle to those who had lost their houses, because the amount of such claims was larger. The amount, he said, ought not to prevent the payment of them. There was a sufficient additional security to the Treasury, certainly, when every claim, from one cent to a hundred thousand dollars, was to pass under the revision of the Secretary of the Treasury. Were the gentlemen afraid to trust the President, who had suspended the decisions of the Commissioner, even as to the peppercorn cases, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) called the horse claims, in consequence of the clamor against the decisions in this District? Has the gentleman confidence in the President, said Mr. J.? So have I. Has he confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, who, as Secretary of War, gave the very restriction to the Commissioner on which the Committee of Claims bottomed their repealing law? So have I. There was another reason why, Mr. J. said, he was attached to the amendment now before the House. It was because of the clause authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House such cases, proper to be paid, as in his opinion did not fall within the law. There were many such cases which ought to be paid; he knew it, for he had had some such cases confided to his care; and he knew that they would be reported to the House under such a provision, because a sense of justice would compel the Secretary to report them. Mr. J. took this occasion to state, that the suspension of the act by the President had only applied to the payment of the money out of the Treasury, and not to the other part of the Commissioner's duties, who was going on with his decisions as if the law had not been suspended; and, the moment this bill should pass, if amended as proposed, Mr. J. said a number of his awards would be ready to receive the revision of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the payment which should be awarded. His object, Mr. J. said, was not to enlarge the provisions of the act of last session, whatever he might think on the subject; but he wished its present provisions to be carried into full effect, &c.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Payment for Lost Property.

H. OF R.

Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, said the question was not now as to the principle of paying for property lost whilst in the service of the United States, but as to the mode of making that payment. For himself, he said, he was averse to judicial conduct on the part of this House, or of both Houses of Congress; considering them totally incompetent to act in that capacity. In the first place, many of the States were deeply interested in the questions to be decided, and the Representatives of those States would probably not be unbiassed in their decisions; and the number of the body was such as to prevent a minute attention to those particularities of evidence on which the merits of many cases must rest. No man, Mr. R. said, even Aristides himself, however just, intelligent, and upright, can decide correctly judicial matters, who receives his information ex parte. It was correct, undoubtedly, that he who had his house occupied as a military deposit, and destroyed, should be paid the amount of his loss; but there ought to be evidence on both sides examined; there ought to be a person to produce evidence on the part of the United States, and sift that adduced on the part of the claimant. Mr. R. dwelt on this idea, and illustrated it by a reference to the usual practice before other judicial tribunals. As to the amendment before the House, of what avail, he asked, would be any provision authorizing a revision by the Secretary of the Treasury? The Commissioner has fixed his course of proceedings; is there any reason to believe that the cases which he has heretofore considered within the limits of the act, will hereafter be considered as without it? In any event, however, the United States ought to have an agent representing their interests before the Commissioner—as in the case of settlements under the sixth article of the British treaty, and many other similar cases. It was asking too much of the Commissioner to be at once a party and a judge in the cases before him. He was opposed to the proposed amendment, because he did not see that it would produce the desired effect; though he did not in anywise approve the bill as reported by the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, after disclaiming any view, in his former observations, to impute selfish motives to the people of the West, said, that when the question in regard to the operation of the act of last session was first agitated in this House, the only objections offered against it were to the conduct of the officer appointed under the act. What, then, had been his surprise, when a bill had been reported by the Committee of Claims, going to affect the most important principle in the law itself? He could not see the connexion between the bill before the House, which went to act upon the law, and the objections to the person acting under the law. If there were any occasion for additional guards on the execution of the law, the amendatory proposition of his friend from Kentucky would answer every purpose. Mr. R. feared, he said, that enough had already been said to prevent decisions under the act, in consequence of a kind of terror which the officer would feel of encountering the censure of this House. As far, Mr. R. said, as he could judge of the conduct of that officer—as far as he could trace his course—he had seen an extreme solicitude on his part to do what was right, in his applying for advice to the departments, and sometimes getting it; in his applying to the highest law officer of the Government, (the Attorney General,) for his official opinion on the construction of the law—from which opinion he had been precluded, because the law had not required the Attorney General to give it. Mr. R. said, he was not satisfied that the Commissioner had not given the act such a construction as he ought—for it ought to be construed liberally, in his opinion—and it depended on the different views of gentlemen on that point, whether the conduct of the Commissioner should be censured or approved. Individual cases had been mentioned as incorrectly decided. The Commissioner might have acted incautiously, possibly; but, Mr. R. said, for an individual to take the pains that he did to obtain the best advice, and then to decide incautiously, seemed to him extremely improbable.

For his part, Mr. R. went on to say, he was of opinion that, as the war was a common affair, so ought the loss and destruction to have been the common loss. To make it so, would have this good consequence—that those who are secure in the interior would cautiously plunge the nation into war, if they knew that they were equally to bear the loss. So far from making individuals indifferent about the protection of property, because it was to be paid for by the Government, it would operate to produce a general defence of the property, because the community would be interested in its preservation. If it was made the business of the nation to protect property, or pay for its destruction, the more inducements would there be to make the defence of every point complete, and the more correctly would the Government act. There were cases yet omitted to be provided for which ought to be; some of which Mr. R. referred to, such as destruction of property by the authority of officers of the United States in the course of the military operations, &c. The law of last session, Mr. R. said, was too narrow, instead of being too wide in its principles. He would have gone further; he would have appropriated a certain sum of money, which should have been apportioned and distributed for losses sustained. On what principle, he asked, was the nation called on to give some indemnification to those who had suffered? On the principle that the destruction brought on them was a destruction which, according to the laws of war, the enemy had a right to produce. Suppose the ruin of individuals had been consequent on conduct of the enemy not sanctioned by the laws of war, and that peace had been made without providing for that indemnity which the enemy ought to have paid, did not the nation stand then in the place of the enemy, as to its obligation to indemnify its citizens for losses? Mr. R. thought it did. Other nations, he said, had thought it was their duty to act on that principle. With regard to the destruction of Moscow, that course had been pursued, and more near and more recently in Canada. Such a course was calculated to secure the affections of the people in those countries. And was there, he asked, a Government on earth which must more rely on the attachment of its citizens, or which was more dependent on their good will, than ours?

Mr. R. repeated his opinion, that as far as the Commissioner had acted liberally, he had acted correctly. He did not know that he had in any case acted improperly; according to the view which Mr. R. had taken of the documents, the Commissioner had shown every disposition to act rightly. Suppose, however, all to be true that had been said; that the Commissioner had acted ever so incorrectly; in that view, the amendment moved by the gentleman from Kentucky would cover the case; which amendment he also approved for another reason, that it directed a report to this House of all just claims presented which did not come under the present act.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said he should vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, and in favor of the bill reported by the Committee of Claims. It was not impossible, however, he might be willing to go as far as the gentleman just sat down in compensating individuals for property actually destroyed or injured in the public service. Of this description of claims there were, he said, two great classes. In respect to the great and important claims for houses destroyed during the late war, it appeared to him it was necessary that Congress should retain the power in their own hands. It had been a ruling principle with him, that Congress ought to perform all the duties imposed on them, without shifting the responsibility to others. If any course of conduct would have a tendency to lessen the character of this branch of the Government, and augment the power of the other branch, it was the practice of putting responsibility from themselves on others. The effect of such a course was, he said, to make the Executive branch of the Government all in all; to take from this body all that makes them estimable or venerable in the eyes of the people. It was very true, that Congress was compelled to delegate a part of its power in regard to the numerous class of cases of horses lost, because they were of so little importance, that while the clerk was employed in reading the report on each case, would be more expense of time and money to the country than the whole claim was worth. They formed a just exception to the general rule he had laid down. But was it so with the other claims under the act of last session? The claim of seven and twenty thousand dollars in this city, he instanced, and others of that description, ought to be specially passed upon by Congress. Gentlemen seemed to object to the Committee of Claims, Mr. T. thought unjustly. Judging from things he had seen on this floor, he felt full confidence in them. Were they so hard-hearted as had been intimated? The gentleman before him (Mr. SMITH) would witness that they had awarded to claimants at Baltimore the value of their property destroyed by order of our officers, to no small amount. Mr. T. urged various reasons why a committee of this House would be a proper tribunal to report on such cases. If the case of O'Neale, for instance, had presented itself to this House in the same shape in which it had done to the Commissioner, was it not probable, he asked, that it might have been granted? But it came before the Committee of Claims at their last session; the testimony being ex parte, they sought for other testimony, and obtained it, which induced them to reject the claim. There was no probability that the House would be too rigorous. For his part, Mr. T. said, though he was not disposed to go the length of the gentleman from Louisiana, he should not be wanting in a proper liberality to the claimants.

The proposition of Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. T. considered as calculated to do no manner of good. If the claims were to be revised by the Secretary of the Treasury, why not at once refer them to some Department of the Government? It had been asked whether the President was not entitled to the confidence of the House? Mr. T. said he had as much confidence in him as most gentlemen, but he did not like that sort of argument pressed on the House, being a question too much ad hominem, when the real question was, whether they ought to shift the responsibility from their own shoulders.

Mr. T. did not wish to see the decision of these claims left to an individual to say how far the nation should be liberal. So far from giving a liberal construction to the law, Mr. T. thought he ought to have done directly the reverse of what he did—not that he did it corruptly, because he believed his character stood far above that imputation. The law ought to have been rigidly construed, because, if he decided for an individual, the money of the public was gone past recovery; if against him, the doors of this body were always open to him.

It had been said that this Government was pledged to grant the claims embraced in the 9th section of the act. Mr. T. said he would not admit it to be true that this House could not as a body be trusted with the redemption of its own faith, or with deciding on claims of any description, particularly on those represented as so just claims. As to the expense to which the claimants had gone in taking evidence, that would not be lost; for, if justified in coming before this House, their evidence would here sustain their claims.

Gentlemen, he said, ought not to put this question on the merits of those who fought in the late war. We all feel them, said Mr. T., but they do not enter at all into the question of conferring power on others, or retaining it in our hands, which is the real question before the House.

Mr. SHEFFEY, of Virginia, next took the floor. What improper provision, he asked, did gentlemen contend to be contained in the act of last session? To which they would answer, as they had done, that there was nothing improper in the law, but there was something improper in the administration of the law. The remedy then, was, not to repeal the law, but to modify the administration of the law. Such was the remedy proposed by the amendment now under consideration. Mr. S. said he would not examine the question how far the Commissioner had corresponded his decisions to the act of the last session; he would only say, if he had erred in his construction of the law, the remedy in the bill was not an appropriate one. It would be much better, he said, that the principle he had acted on should be carried throughout the whole of the claims coming under it, than to establish an odious distinction between the people of one part of the country and of another part. There were a number of persons here, who, from the convenience of their situation, had come forward, and, having their claims allowed, had received money therefor. What sort of justice would it be, he asked, that the people on the Niagara frontier should not also get it? It was more important that the principle of justice, of liberality if you please, should be extended to all, than that a different rule should be observed as to different sections of the country. He would rather sacrifice a million than establish the principle that one part of the people should be treated in one way and one in another. If gentlemen objected to the competency of the officer, the check or control proposed in the amendment would remove the objection, by placing these claims in the same situation as all other demands against the Government, which first pass under the scrutiny of the accounting officers, and then undergo revision by the head of a department. Such a control over the Commissioner would have, beside, the salutary effect of conforming his decisions to the practice already established in the department.

A gentleman had said that it would be prostrating the dignity of the House to divest themselves of the responsibility of deciding specially on claims coming under the next section of the act. Mr. S. denied it. That was not a prostration of the dignity of the House, but he would tell the gentleman what it was. It is prostrating the dignity of Congress, said he, to confide the general affairs of the Government entirely to the heads of department, to have to consult the Secretary of State whenever we want to know anything of our foreign relations, and echo his language; to run to the Secretary of the Treasury whenever you wish to know anything of the finances. But it was no disrespect to themselves to refer to a Commissioner the examination of small cases of sufferers in the war. There were cases, it was true, which could not be brought within general rules, which should be specially examined; but all cases coming within general rules ought to be confided to a subordinate authority. To show the unfitness of this House for the decision of numerous claims, Mr. S. instanced the proceedings of the House in the case of any private claim. Would the gentleman tell him that there was deliberation, that there was judgment exercised in such cases? How many in this House knew anything of the facts in deciding on a private claim? who put themselves to the trouble to think about it? This observation was not personal to the members of the House, but it arose from the nature of things. Such bodies were wholly incompetent to the adjudication of claims. Mr. S. conceived the principle adopted by the 9th section of the act of last session to be a proper one, such as all just Governments would adopt; because, according to the laws of war, an enemy has a right to destroy property employed for military purposes. It is in fact, said he, your act—Government being bound to protect its citizens from the rightful acts of the enemy. So far did the act of the last session go, and no farther. He was therefore opposed to repealing any part of it.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said it was with great reluctance he rose to address the Committee, as well on general grounds of objection to occupying the time of the House, as because he rose in opposition to the report of a committee which deserved great credit for its general conduct, and for the uniform correctness of its decisions. The House were called upon by the bill reported by that committee to repeal the 9th section of the act now in question; to which his friend from Kentucky had proposed an amendment which had for its object a modification of the administration of the law. Before the House determined to repeal that section of the law, they ought to examine and see whether in fact there was anything to be reprobated in the principle of it. What was that principle? It was this: that, when the Government seizes the property of a private individual, and converts it to the uses of the community, and the property is in consequence thereof destroyed, there exists an obligation on the community to indemnify the particular individual who has suffered. That being the principle, could there be any member of the House who would say it was wrong? The public, said he, seizes my house, converts it into a garrison, and the enemy destroys it: is not the public, on every principle of justice, bound to indemnify me for the loss? Unquestionably; and such was the principle of the 9th section of the law. What were the securities which the section contained against abuses which might arise under it? In the first place, occupation as a military deposit was required; in the second place, the occupation must have been authorized by an officer or agent of the General Government acting under it, and the destruction must be traced to that cause before the sufferers can be entitled to compensation. There was, then, in his conception, Mr. C. said, nothing in the principle, nothing in the details of the 9th section, which called for the animadversion of this House. It ought to be retained, because it was founded in justice and policy; whilst the report of the Committee of Claims went to put everything afloat, and turn the claimants over to this House for redress.

But a worthy gentleman from Virginia, to whom he always listened with great respect, had said that the section ought to be repealed, because it devolved duties and responsibility from this House on others. What, Mr. C. asked, was the business of legislation? The prescription of rules. It resulted from the nature of all Legislatures that a Legislature cannot apply the rules it is its duty to prescribe. Did Congress, in enacting the law of last session, cast from their shoulders the responsibility of prescribing the rules which were to guide the decisions of these claims? No, certainly. If they had, then might they with some justice have been charged with shrinking from their duty, and surrounding the Executive with an importance which would prostrate the dignity of this body. Congress prescribed the rules, and directed the appointment of a subordinate officer to apply them.

But, although the rule prescribed in the 9th section were indisputably correct, being founded on justice, it was contended that there had been such abuse under it, that the House ought to guard the Treasury against further decisions under it. With regard to the conduct of the Commissioner, whose decisions had been called into question, Mr. C. said he really did not think that officer had had fair play on this floor, the House having appeared in a sort of trepidation whenever the subject was agitated, without having regard to the principles on which the Commissioner had decided, and the facts on which his decisions were founded. Mr. C. expressed his regret that the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of the Commissioner had not reported, as it was due to the House, due to themselves, and to the Commissioner, that they should have done. In a mass of decisions by that Commissioner, amounting to seven hundred in number, two or three only had been picked out as incorrectly decided. If in seven hundred cases he had decided six hundred and ninety-seven correctly, and only three incorrectly, Mr. C. demanded whether, when we consider the fallible nature of all human transactions, the conduct of the Commissioner ought to have been subjected to the severe remarks which had been made on this floor. The decisions of the modern Aristides, the virtuous Chancellor Wythe, not exceeded in high character by the great Grecian himself, had not excited less scrutiny. Mr. C. said he had happened to turn his attention to the decisions of the Chancellor, and he found that out of about two hundred decisions, in a particular period, twenty or thirty had been taken up to the Appeal Court, and out of that number ten had been reversed. Suppose the conduct of an officer like him had been brought before a legislature, and those ten cases only had been brought into view, how unjustly would his conduct have been viewed! Upon the three cases which had been particularly objected to, he had no hesitation in saying, on the statement of gentlemen themselves, that they had been made incorrectly; that Carroll's and Ringgold's houses did not appear to have been destroyed in consequence of their military occupation. But he would say, that the House ought to have a report on the whole of the cases, and not to pronounce, on the representation before them of two or three cases, that the Commissioner had acted so incorrectly as to make it necessary to repeal a material part of the law, and leave the parties to seek relief by petition, session after session, to this House.

With regard to the merits of the cases themselves, embraced within that section, it was impossible for the House to decide. But, said Mr. C., let us select a class of cases; let us recur, for instance, to the class described in the memorial from the sufferers on the Niagara frontier. What was the case? By a sort of tacit consent, the war there raged with peculiar force. It had been the policy of the Government (and in his judgment properly) to carry the war into Canada, to draw it off rather from the maritime frontier to the provinces of the enemy. What had been the consequences? Particularly unfortunate to the inhabitants of the Niagara frontier; every house became a garrison, every man a soldier. Scarcely a man had escaped without the loss of life or property. If, in the case of a war of this kind, individuals suffer losses, ought they not to be indemnified as far as is consistent with the ability of the country? Mr. C. assumed the position, and he said he feared not how some gentlemen might be startled at it, that whenever nations were at war, it was their duty to indemnify their citizens for all losses sustained on the land; and that, if they fail to do it, it must be because, from the nature and extent of those demands, it was morally impossible the nation should satisfy them. So it was in the case of our Revolutionary war; the resources of the nation were then wholly inadequate to compensate individuals for their losses. This was a principle, he said, which we find acted on by all Governments. Where they can completely execute it they do: where they cannot go to the full extent, they alleviate the sufferings of the people as much as possible. Mr. C. here referred to the recent conduct of the Emperor of Russia in this respect. We have all seen, he said, a notification of his visiting the various provinces of his Empire devastated by war, to repair, as far as possible, the losses of the people, and alleviate their sufferings. Was there any aspect in which a sovereign could present himself, more calculated to endear him to the people, to rally them about him, than to see him examining their houses and mitigating their pains? But if the general principle were correct, as he had laid it down, was not its force increased in the case of a war of voluntary declaration on the part of the nation, whose citizens apply for remuneration of their losses? And did it not advance in strength as we proceed to the case of the Niagara frontier, which suffered, not a partial loss of the goods of the whole, but whose whole property fell a sacrifice to the prosecution of the war, which a principle of policy carried to their shores? Look, he said, at what other Governments have done in this respect. The British Government had determined to repair to their Canadian subjects the injuries which they had suffered. Nay, what had one of our States done, invited by the amount of suffering on her borders? The Legislature of New York had voted $30,000, for the partial relief of the sufferers on her frontiers. When, then, said Mr. C., we are provoked by the examples of Governments across the water, amongst them that of our late enemy, healing the injuries of their people inflicted by the ravages of war; when we come home, and see one of the States of this sovereignty, feeling for the losses of its citizens, voting money for their relief—and when we reflect that the late war was one in which, as the one or other army prevailed, death and destruction followed in its train—when so stimulated, let me ask, if we had failed to make proper provisions in this respect, if we should not have indeed deserved that hardened character, which, I regret to see, in a neighboring Legislature, has been assigned to us?

If the principle of the act of last session was just, and the administration only of it not just, Mr. C. prayed of gentlemen not to carry their efforts beyond the emergency of the case, but leave individuals to obtain that redress which was promised to them by the ninth section of the act of the last session. Was there a gentleman here who could be insensible to the importance of that promise? Would they make distance from the Seat of Government a reason for refusing redress? Beware, said he, how you increase the difficulties experienced from the present expansion of our territory! Will you say, that to the man within the sound of my voice you will give a treatment different from that which you afford him who is at a distance? Those people had collected the evidence of their claims at great expense and trouble; and at the moment when they presented their cases, the House were called on in a panic to repeal the law, without making any other provision, or leaving them any other remedy than what Mr. C. considered a refusal of their claims. They were to be told, indeed, that they might petition Congress. A poor remuneration! His word for it, the parties would go unremunerated, and without redress. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) had properly stated the case of private claims before the House. How often, Mr. C. said, when he had in his official character called on the members for their responses on a question of agreeing to a report of a committee on a private claim, he had received not a solitary aye or no on the question! Case after case, he said, was decided on the report of the Committee of Claims, without a single individual, except the members of the committee and the member who presented the petition, knowing anything about it. We want competency, said he, not mental but physical, to decide correctly on such questions. The right to be heard by petition in this House is in fact little more than the right to have your petition rejected. Last session, when the sufferers individually applied to us, the answer given was, that there should be a general principle established, and a special tribunal for the decision of their claims. That was accordingly done; and the Government was now pledged, Mr. C. said, to the performance of that principle by all the sacred obligations of honor, justice, and duty.

Mr. C. concluded by saying, that if no better amendment should be devised than that proposed by his worthy friend, he should vote for it.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, said, he was opposed to this amendment, but should not have troubled the Committee with any remarks, but for some observations from his worthy colleague (Mr. SHEFFEY) in relation to the competency of this body to decide on private claims, at which he expressed his surprise. Mr. R. asked whether there was not more self-possession, more free agency in deputing a number of this body to examine and report the facts in regard to a claim, and thereupon legislating, than in transferring the power and discretion to other hands? If there was objection to the Committee of Claims because of its limited number, a fortiori there must be greater to this miserable Commissioner—miserable, he said, for he would call any man miserable who stood before this House and this nation in the relation in which he was placed. It might as well be made a reproach to the modern Aristides that he sent down to a jury of twelve men for certain facts on which a cause depended, as to this House, that it depended on the report of its committees on cases of private claims. The case, he said, was plain. He was content to trust the Committee of Claims—as content to trust any committee of this House as any department of this Government. The committee was trustworthy; as far as he was acquainted with them they deserved the confidence of the House. But an honorable member whose exhortations, said Mr. R., it becomes us all to listen to with profound respect, (the Speaker,) has referred to the great apathy prevailing on private claims, so that he was frequently obliged to decide without an aye or no. Mr. R. said he was afraid—not vouching for the fact, either one way or the other, but bound to take it for the fact, the gentleman having said it—if the House was to give up its power in the case of private claims because no man responded aye or no to the Chair, that it might be given up in almost every case, since bills frequently passed before the House with as little attention, exciting as little interest in this body as reports from the Committee on Claims. From the same authority the House had been told that the right of petitioning this House was the right of having petitions rejected. For the honor—yea, for the honor of this House, as well as for the interest of this nation, Mr. R. said he wished that in some cases coming within his observation since he had had a seat on this floor, this observation were correct. So far from considering the right of petition the right of rejection, if it gave any objectionable right, it was that stated by the honorable member from Virginia who first spoke; that the petitioner has an opportunity of imposing on the watchfulness of the committees; of creating a feeling—a feeling out of the House, to operate in decisions here. Mr. R. said he could bring to the recollection of this body some cases which had been pressed upon the consideration of this House; cases as manifestly unjust, as obviously not coming within the spirit of equity, as any case decided by this Commissioner. What had been the consequence? Why, petition after petition had been presented; year after year the claim had been pressed; the evidence on the part of the claimant never getting worse, that on the part of the public never getting better; till finally, in some moment of supineness, some moment of ungarded liberality, the House was prevailed upon to affix its seal to the claim. He was aware, as far as it went, this would go to show the impropriety of making committees of this House decide conclusively on claims; but that was no reason why a commission heretofore unknown to this country should be established, and the old barriers of the Treasury be thrown down. If the claims of these individuals were legal at the Treasury, they would be paid. If not, said Mr. R., open the courts of justice to them; make the United States suable, or adopt some other measure which will bring their claims to an equitable test, or reserve the power in your own hands. If you delegate it, do it at least to a responsible tribunal. The principal objection to the amendment before the House was, that it went to divide the responsibility—not to eke out the lion's hide with the fox's skin, but to eke out the fox's skin with the lion's hide. Charity—and this was a charitable affair—charity, he said, would cover a multitude of sins—not meaning, in his remarks, any disrespect to the Head of the Treasury. Wherever responsibility was divided, it was lessened. It was not expected that the Secretary of the Treasury could separately examine all these claims—the provision proposed would terminate in empty form—but behind the ægis of the Treasury the Commissioner would find safety. If he could stand with safety on the ground he now occupied, what might he not do when all his acts were sanctioned by that influential department?

But, it appears, said Mr. R., that we must go on in the course we have commenced, because to do otherwise would make a difference between classes of claimants; because the United States having been—it is not worth while to mince the matter—having been most shamefully and scan-daloously plundered, under pretence of equitable claims, to the amount of some forty, fifty, or sixty thousand dollars, every other man must be allowed to put his lancet in and bleed the Treasury. If the public veins contained more blood than Leviathan himself, Mr. R. said it would not satisfy them all. But, said gentlemen, the Commissioner had had a jog; such claims in the time to come will not be admitted. Ah! then, what becomes of the argument that all cases of claims of the same nature ought to be paid alike? But give us the same man, gentlemen seemed to say, and you may change principles as you will, for no man will say that the House is prepared to support a continuation of these decisions on the same principle on which some have been made by the Commissioner. You may bring to-morrow, not only from within five hundred miles of this place, but within five, the same sort of claims, and produce them to this Commissioner, whether the same person be in office or not, and I presume you would have them at once rejected. But how cruel it is, when the cup of fruition is as it were at the lips of the panting expectant, for this House, for the Committee of Claims—that Rhadamanthean committee—to dash it from the parched lips of these thirsty patriots! For my own part, sir, I have but one favor to ask of this or of any other Government under the sun—that they would keep their hands off my person and out of my pocket. And, on the principle that I do not wish these Commissioners, ad libitum, to plunge their hands into my pocket, it is that I am against the amendment. I have no doubt, in consequence of malfeasance under this law, if it were to be repealed, some injustice would be done; but I cannot, therefore, consent that every man restrained by nothing, by no sense of honor, morality, or reputation, may dive his hand as deep as he pleases into the public chest. I cannot consent to it. Mr. R. concluded by saying that he hoped not only that the amendment would be rejected, but that there would be some further modification of this bill. So far from deserving the character given to it in this Committee, the bill had not gone far enough, he thought, to secure the public against plunderers.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, acknowledged the justice of many observations which had been made; but he had heard no gentleman, except the gentleman last up, object to the principle of the ninth section proposed to be repealed. [Mr. RANDOLPH said, he did not object to the principle.] Then, Mr. G. said, he did not know how the gentleman intended to apply his speech. If he objected to striking out the provision in this bill for repealing part of the law now in existence—[Mr. RANDOLPH said, he would tell the gentleman what he meant: he was in favor of making compensation where he thought it was due—he thought the present law defective—he thought the bill before the Committee defective, and that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky would make it more defective than it already is.] Mr. G. said, he had not much misapprehended the gentleman. The simple question, after all was said and done, Mr. G. said, was this: is this House a better tribunal for hearing testimony or for applying the principles of law than a Commissioner, or is a Commissioner better than this House? This was the only question remaining. Can we, said he, arrive better at truth, doing justice to individuals, by the ordinary examination of private claims in the House, or will not a commission, consisting of one, two, or three men, accomplish this object better than we. In short, said he, is this a better tribunal than our courts of justice for such decision? The nature of the case forbade it, as Mr. G. proceeded to show by various illustrations. The gentleman from Virginia had said, he would as soon trust the Committee of Claims as a Commissioner. Why, yes, Mr. G. said, if that committee were put into commission, properly constituted, and having sufficient time on their hands; and so would he. But how different was their situation, he said, having but one hour on two or three mornings in a week to hear evidence and decide on cases, to do justice to which would take weeks if not months of laborious attention. The fact was undeniable, he said, that this House was incompetent to decide on claims. In nine cases out of ten, it decided on claims without ten men in the House knowing what it was upon. Why, they would not even, in cases of great magnitude, print the case, that they might have an opportunity of knowing something of it. He recollected the other day, the case of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier, of which the House had refused the printing—[Mr. RANDOLPH in an under tone asked, why the petitioners had not printed it themselves?] Perhaps if they had, gentlemen would have found it too voluminous to read, and their money would have been thrown away. Petitions generally seemed to be left to the person presenting them, to do and negotiate with the committee. If the committee reported unfavorably, to be sure, the decision might be reversed by the House; which he believed had never happened. [Mr. YANCEY, or some member of the Committee of Claims, here intimated that they had frequently been reversed.] Mr. G. said, he was extremely glad to hear it; for it held out to him some prospect of getting a recent report of the committee reversed, which he was sure ought to be set aside. The committee was a very safe one for the public, Mr. G. said; they were excellent hands to dash the cup from the parched lips of the petitioners—parched indeed by suffering and distress—many of whom had had their property destroyed, and others left orphans and widows by the chances of war. When a member came with these claims before that committee—they were honorable men, but they were rigid—they had not only shut the door of the Treasury against the claimants, but thrown the key into the ocean. Going on to compare the decisions of this House with those of the Commissioner, Mr. G. said, it was certain this House would grant too little, and barely possible the Commissioner would grant too much; and, if the Commissioner should err in one out of a thousand cases, he would only award payment to some poor wretch, whose misfortune it would be that his loss, equally grievous with others, did not come within the nice technicalities of the law. In committing such an error, if I were the Commissioner, said Mr. G., I would solace myself with the recollection of it during my whole life. Mr. G. said, he would grant too much rather than too little. It was really but a trifle, after all. Suppose Congress were to give to the Niagara sufferers all they had lost—it would be but a few hundred thousand dollars. Throughout the whole United States, if all losses were to be paid for, Mr. G. said, he did not believe they would amount to two millions; with the provisions of the present law, he did not believe the amount would be a million.

The gentleman last up had said, the people of the United States would not bear decisions on the principle that the Commissioner had established. Mr. G. said, he knew of no construction the Commissioner had given to this law that he found fault with. The Commissioner, said he, went to the President and to the Secretary at War, and decided according to their constructions. The difficulty was, if any, that testimony, bringing cases within his construction that ought not to have been there, had not been sufficiently scrutinized. If so, the gentleman last up was wrong in saying, the principles of decision would be changed, when in fact there would be only a check on the reception of testimony.

As to the dignity and duty of this House, he said it was their duty to originate and establish principles of law; it was never intended this House should examine the facts as to particular claims on the Treasury, nor was it their duty. There was nothing new in this doctrine. The gentleman had said, the House were establishing a novel principle. No such thing, said Mr. G. Does not the Secretary of the Treasury, on general principles, settle accounts every day; in cases of contracts for supplying the Army, Navy, &c.? There was nothing different in principle in the law of last session from such cases; there was, therefore, no barrier broken down whatever. Mr. G. said, he was not fully satisfied with the amendment; he would be in favor of adding two Commissioners to the present—but gentlemen appeared to have gotten into their heads that they must be very economical, and thus hazard the loss of a great deal more than would pay the salary of these additional Commissioners. But if money was saved here, no matter where else it leaked out. Mr. G. made some further illustrations of his views, and concluded his argument in favor of a commission for deciding on claims, by a reference to the commission appointment for settling the conflicting Yazoo Claims, which he said he had no doubt would bring the case perfectly home to the recollection of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.)

Mr. CALHOUN next spoke. He said, it had been remarked that the administration of the law by the Commissioner was defective, and not the law itself; but, Mr. C. said, in vindicating this bill, and opposing the amendment, he objected not to the administration of the law, but to the part of the law itself which was proposed to be repealed. He considered it objectionable in point of principle. There was a material difference, he said, between cases of property destroyed in the military service, and those of houses destroyed by the enemy. The one case was defined, the other not. Besides, the cases of houses destroyed were but few; whilst cases of the former description were numerous. There was, therefore, good reason to make a distinction between the two classes of cases. Mr. C. considered the case of the destruction of houses by an enemy as involving a great principle. He knew that the gentlemen from Louisiana and Kentucky had expressed their views, that the whole amount of property destroyed by an enemy during war should be paid for out of the public funds. To this doctrine, Mr. C. objected altogether. The very declaration of war, he said, changed the value of property. If you do away the direct effect of war by paying for property actually destroyed, ought you not to compensate individuals for indirect losses occasioned by the war? The very declaration of war, he said, sunk the value of tonnage fifty, sixty, or seventy per cent. If you would remunerate individuals for houses destroyed by an enemy, why not for other property, whose value, equally important to the owners, is equally destroyed by the war? How will you distinguish between these cases? Other laws, besides acts of war, are frequently made by a Government, which change the value of property. An embargo is laid, for instance, by which a certain description of property, to a large amount, is made wholly unproductive. The idea of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. C. said, went upon a misconception. All laws are made for the general good; and, whether an individual be benefitted or not, it is his duty to acquiesce, and not oppose the decision of his country. The declaration of war did on the frontier of New York produce distress; but the interior of New York it enriched with a shower of gold. It benefitted them with a market which others had not. To equalize the effects of the war exactly, according to gentlemen's notions, you should take from those who were benefitted by the war, and give to those who sustained loss.

The reason why, Mr. C. said, he was indisposed to submit this important class of cases to the decision of any commissioner, was, that the cases descended by imperceptible gradations from occupation that was military, to that which was not. For example, the whole of the houses on a part of the Niagara frontier had been destroyed; many of them were in the occupation of military force, but the majority were not, but were destroyed in the neighborhood of the others. Here, then, is a class of cases of great importance, not only as to the amount of the claims, but as to the doctrine connected with them; they were such as no commissioner could decide. If the principle was established of paying for them all, in the event of any future war it would bankrupt the nation. If a commercial town was attacked, the nation must pay for every house destroyed! Say the city of New York was destroyed, could the Treasury meet so vast a claim for reimbursement? It could not. Beware, said Mr. C., how you introduce the principle into the statute book, of destroying the distinction between public and private property! By doing so, you become the universal insurers. The enemy will make war on you in that way which will most affect your Treasury. If you adopt the principle advocated by these gentlemen, your towns may fall a sacrifice to it, in the hope thereby to bankrupt you.

It had been stated that this House was not a proper tribunal to decide on private claims. Mr. C. said he regretted to hear this remark, particularly from the source from which it came. This House was as capable, Mr. C. said, as any tribunal whatever. A committee might be selected who would attend with vigilance to the claims, as would the present Committee of Claims; and if the House was not very vigilant in superintending the reports of its committees, why was it not? Because they had a confidence in the reports, which, as regarded the Committee of Claims, Mr. C. asserted to be well founded. Mr. C. said he was sorry to see acquiescence in the acts of a committee construed into inattention and want of disposition to attend to them. The gentleman from Virginia had well said, that this kind of negligence, experienced in private cases, was equally applicable to public bills. It is not the fact, said Mr. C., that this acquiescence is negligence. The House is vigilant and attentive: and, when there is not an express division on any question before it, it only indicates that the members of the House have made up their mind on the subject, and do not desire a division.

The House of Representatives, Mr. C. said, was not, he believed, a favorite body in the nation. It had no patronage to bestow, no favors to grant, and could rely only on its own character to sustain it; and it was, therefore, the duty of members to defend the character of the House. It had been said that the power of petitioning this House was merely the power of having a petition rejected. Mr. C. considered the reverse the fact; that mere importunity sometimes succeeded in obtaining claims which ought never to have been allowed. He was aware, he said, that this argument made something against the capacity of this House to decide on claims, but not in the sense in which the gentlemen from New York and Kentucky had pressed this point against the House. If any failing in this respect was imputable to the House, Mr. C. said it was that they acted with too much feeling; and when the claimants came before this House, they would find ample indulgence. Mr. C. said, further, that he was clearly of opinion that where, in the cases of houses destroyed, there could be proved regular military occupation by military force, the cases would be favorably decided. But the cases changed by minute gradations, from actual to accidental military occupation, in such manner that he was unwilling to trust the decision of those cases to any tribunal but this House.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. C. said he was sorry he had, in any degree, provoked the sensibility of the gentleman from South Carolina, but was happy to find, from this occasion, that the House had in him so happy an eulogist. When he had said that the right of petition was little more than the right of rejection, he did not mean certainly in the cases of great rights occasionally brought before this House, but in minor cases they were incompetent to investigate and decide on claims. And, when the gentleman had run away with his remarks on this, as he had done on another point, he should have been glad had he correctly appreciated them. I state the fact, said Mr. C., let the consequence be what it may, that, on the decision of a claim, in nine cases out of ten, on the report of the Committee of Claims, there are nine out of ten of the members who do not understand the question. And, in saying this, Mr. C. said, he meant to cast no reflection on the House; the relation in which he stood to it, and the favor he had received from the House, his knowledge of the high character and integrity of the members who composed it, forbade the idea. But he stated, in what he had applied to this House, a fact inherent in all public bodies.

The gentleman had not less misunderstood him on this point, Mr. C. said, than on the general principles with which he set out; and he should have been unmindful of the respect due to himself, if he had not considered all the consequences of the position he had taken, in all the views in which the gentleman's abstract mind had placed it. The case of maritime loss, Mr. C. said, he had excepted from his position. But he could conceive, that in cases of maritime loss, where a nation plunges into war without giving notice to its citizens, and occasions distress, there may be an obligation on the nation to remunerate the loss, although from want of ability it may not attempt to do it. There was another modification of the principle, also; the national ability to pay, or the effect of such payment on the general welfare: and, Mr. C. said, he would admit, in cases where the extent of the injury is very great, where a desolating or conflagrating war of invasion has laid waste a whole country, the nation ought not to indemnify its citizens; not because it would not be just, but because it was impossible, and the sovereign authority was compelled to look on the case silently. So in the case of cities. His principle was, Mr. C. said, that where the individuals of a country have suffered losses in war, of the kind spoken of, it was for the nation to judge, looking to the state of its finances, whether, from the state of its circumstances, it can fulfil what, if it be able, be a solemn obligation.

With regard to the consequences of such a policy, Mr. C. said he differed essentially with the gentleman, when he supposed it would invite an enemy to destroy your property. The nation which is to make this indemnity to its citizens for losses, makes it not at the moment of the loss, but consults its own inclination as to time and manner. But the gentleman had hinted that an enemy would destroy your towns, in order to make the destruction a public loss. Did the gentleman believe that no consideration but individual suffering now and ever will restrain such conduct in a civilized enemy? No; hopeless indeed, said Mr. C., would be the condition of the world, if the security of individual property in war rested on the basis on which the gentleman had placed it. The security of individual property results, first, from the progress of mind, the civilization of man, and next, from the apprehension of bringing dreadful retaliation on the subjects of the assailant. Would not any enemy reason very badly who would reason as the gentleman had done? When meditating the destruction of the city of New York, that the public might suffer the loss, would not the enemy say, if I do this, I shall have against me the united voice of the whole civilized world? Would he not further say, if I do it, London or Paris, my own cities, will suffer in consequence of it? Yes, Mr. C. said, it was a visionary idea. A security against such conduct in an enemy was found in the melioration of the condition of man in relation to the prosecution of war, and in the apprehension of being themselves visited in like manner.

Mr. C. said he did not comprehend distinctly what the gentleman was in favor of; but understood him to intimate, that if the property of an individual was seized and converted to public use, and in consequence thereof destroyed, it ought to be paid for. Such, Mr. C. said, was the provision in the existing law, which he was opposed to repealing, &c., believing that a commissioner or any single judge was better able to decide on the evidence of such cases, than this House could be.

After Mr. C. concluded, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 31.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the acting Secretary of War, in pursuance of a resolution of the last session, on the letter of Major General Harrison, relative to the expenditures of public money by him, on the Northwestern frontier during the late war; which, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was referred to a select committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made unfavorable reports on the petition of sundry inhabitants of Jefferson county, in the Mississippi Territory; on the petition of John W. Simpson, and of sundry inhabitants of Shawanoe town, in the Illinois Territory; which reports were severally read and concurred in.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Lawrence and others, merchants residing in the city of New York; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the petition of Rufus Easton, contesting the election of JOHN SCOTT as Delegate from Missouri Territory, which was read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next. The report is as follows:

That, at the last election in said Territory, the petitioner and the said John Scott were opposing candidates. The whole number of votes counted, cast up, and arranged, by William Clarke, Governor of the Territory, as having been given at the said election for Delegate to Congress, and upon which his certificate was founded, was 3,647, of which, 1,816 were given for John Scott, and 1,801 for the petitioner, and thirty for other persons.

The petitioner stated the following objections, in writing, to the election and return of John Scott as Delegate from said Territory:

"1st. That, according to all the votes given at the election on the first Monday in August, 1816, counting those legally returned, and such as were not returned within the time prescribed by law, or were rejected, he has a majority of fifteen votes over his opponent, John Scott. To prove which, he refers the honorable Committee of Elections to the abstract of votes returned to the Governor, according to the act to regulate elections in that Territory, being document marked B, to the depositions of S. A. M. Carter, Andrew Kinkaid, Clement B. Penrose, and John Cunningham.

"2d. That, according to the abstract of votes legally and illegally made to the Governor, the said Rufus Easton has a majority of seven votes over the said John Scott, considering the copy of the paper from Cote Sans Dessein, in the county of St. Charles, certified by the clerk of that county to be a copy on the 18th of September, 1816, more than a month after the abstract of votes from that county had been filed in the Executive office, not to be an abstract of votes, but a nullity, as it certainly is; to prove which, the honorable Committee of Elections are referred to the seventh section of the act of the Territory, entitled 'An act to regulate elections,' which provides 'that, previous to any votes being received, the judges and clerks shall severally take an oath or affirmation,' in the form therein prescribed. The deposition of Isaac Best, one of the persons who pretended to act as judge, proves that 'one Baptiste Roy was the only person who acted with him as judge, and that a person of the name of Frereault acted as clerk, and no other; and that neither of the judges or clerk were sworn.' The act requires, that there should be three judges and two clerks to hold an election; 'that the poll shall be opened at eight o'clock in the forenoon, and close at six in the afternoon; that the persons who shall administer the oaths shall cause an entry thereof to be prefixed to the poll-books in words to the following effect: 'I do hereby certify that — judges and — clerks of the election, held in the township of —, in the county of —, on the — day of —, in the year one thousand eight hundred and —, were severally sworn, as the law directs, previously to entering on the duties of their office; which certificate shall be subscribed by the person administering the said oaths or affirmations, and be considered as a part of the record of the said elections.' The act further requires that each clerk shall furnish himself a poll-book of the election; and, at the close of the polls, the names of the electors contained upon the poll-book shall be counted and set down, in writing, at the foot of the column in which they are entered, and the number of votes cast up and arranged, and set down, in writing, at the foot of the poll-book, and shall be signed by the judges, and countersigned by the clerks, &c. And further, that the electors shall vote by ballot. [See sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 13, of the act to regulate elections.] None of these requisites were complied with at Cote Sans Dessein; which is not only proven by the return of the persons pretending to hold an election there, but by the deposition of Joseph Roy, that 'two persons acted as judges, and another person did the writing; that the polls were opened at 11 A. M., and closed at 2 P. M.; that one Charles Rello refused to vote for any person, but was forced to do so by the judges, who sent a paper to bring him before them.' The depositions of Francois Denoyer and Joseph Morin prove that the judges put on the list the names of persons as voting for Mr. Scott, who did not vote, and who were not in the township on the day of the election; and the depositions of Peter Powell and Asa Williams prove 'that George Evans, alias Avans, and Jesse Avans, whose names appear on the list as voting for Mr. Scott, had not been in the Territory eight months prior to the day of election; and that the votes were given by word of mouth.' The act of Congress requires a residence of one year. By the deposition of Baptiste Pineau, it appears he was out hunting on the day of election, and yet his own, or son's name, who is about seventeen or eighteen years old, is listed as voting for Mr. Scott. Joseph Morin's deposition proves that he was absent on the day of election; that his name was listed as voting for Mr. Scott, without his consent or approbation; and that the name of Joseph Rivard, fil., (junior,) who is only eighteen or nineteen years of age, is listed as voting for Mr. Scott.

"Notwithstanding all the defects apparent upon the face of the paper relating to the election at Cote Sans Dessein, and although the same had been rejected by a majority of the justices and clerk of the court, authorized by the fifteenth section of the beforementioned act regulating elections, 'to make the abstract of votes for Delegates to Congress, which, being signed by the judges, or justices, and clerk, or any two of them, shall be deposited in the clerk's office, and a copy thereof, certified under the official seal of such clerk, shall be transmitted, by express, to the Governor of the Territory. And it shall be the duty of the Governor, within thirty days after the expiration of the time allowed for making county returns, to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as may have made returns, for each person voted for as Delegate to Congress, and shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation, declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be elected as Delegate to represent the Territory in the House of Representatives of the United States, and to grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the Territory, to the person so elected;' and, although the abstract of votes for Delegate to Congress, from the county of St. Charles, had been made and sent to the Governor on the 17th day of August, 1816, after all the returns which had been made from the other counties, it appeared, according to those abstracts, that Rufus Easton had a majority of seven votes; the Governor, nevertheless, refused him a certificate of his election, although, according to law and common justice, he was entitled to it. The said John Scott, taking with him a certain George Ferguson and James Brady,

Missouri Contested Election.

proceeded to the county of St. Charles, and requested of the clerk a copy of the election return of Cote Sans Dessein. The clerk made out a copy of the paper to be found in the third page of document B, and described under 'note,' 'The following return was received at the Executive office (delivered by James Brady) on the 18th of September, 1816;' and the said John Scott requested the clerk to fold it, and direct it to the Governor of the Territory; and the clerk directed it to 'his Excellency William Clark, Esq., St. Louis.' For which copy the clerk was paid by the said John Scott, or his order, and the copy was taken, in the night, from the clerk's office, by the said Ferguson or Brady; all of which facts appear, by the deposition of William Christy, junior, Esq., clerk; on which paper there appears the name of Rufus Easton, with one other name under it, and the name of John Scott, with twenty-three other names under it; which paper was not and is not an abstract of votes, and the Governor had no power, legal authority, or right, to make use of it as such.

"3d. That, according to the abstract of votes certified agreeable to law, and returned to the Governor of the Territory of Missouri, according to the statute in that case provided, the said Rufus Easton has a majority of fifty-one votes over his opponent, John Scott, which appears from a copy of the said abstracts contained in document marked B., that, in the county of Lawrence the clerk has made the abstract of votes from that county himself, sent the original to the Governor, and not a copy, which he had no authority to do; and that no abstract of votes having been made, signed by the judges, or justices, and clerk, or any two of them, deposited in the clerk's office, and a copy thereof, certified under the official seal of the clerk, the Governor had no authority under the law to count the votes given in that county.

"The above objections are submitted to the honorable Committee of Elections by Rufus Easton, to show that he has been arbitrarily and erroneously deprived of a right secured to him by law, in the granting of a certificate of election by the Governor of the Territory of Missouri to John Scott, as the Delegate of that Territory.

"The said Rufus Easton wishes it understood by the honorable committee, that, by laying these objections before them, he will not be prevented or precluded, at any stage of the examination, from making other statements, and exhibiting other proofs and documents in support of his right.

"RUFUS EASTON.

By the twenty-third section of the act to regulate elections in the said Territory, it is enacted in the following words: "that in all elections to be held in pursuance of this act, the electors shall vote by ballot." It was intended by the Legislature to insure to each elector the privilege of a secret vote, to enable him more independently to exercise the elective franchise. The committee know of no authority competent to compel an elector to disclose the name of the candidate for whom he voted; but without such disclosure it is in vain to inquire into the qualification of an elector, with a view to purge the polls. It would become important only as it related to the conduct of the judges of the election. They are clothed with full power to examine, upon oath, and adjudge every elector presenting himself to vote, either qualified or disqualified; they may admit or reject him. They are liable to punishment if they knowingly receive an improper vote, or conduct themselves, in any respect, with partiality. The committee are of opinion that their adjudication, as to the qualification of electors under the law of the Territory, should be final.

The committee, therefore, overruled so much of the objections of the petitioner as related to the qualifications of the electors, and decided that they would not investigate the same, nor inquire for whom they respectively voted. Of the 3,647 votes, above mentioned, there were given in the township of Cote Sans Dessein twenty-three for John Scott, and one for the petitioner. The votes of this township were unanimously rejected by the committee for a variety of causes, among which are the following:

1. The election was held viva voce.
2. But two persons acted as judges, and neither of them were sworn.
3. But one person acted as clerk, and he was not sworn.

4. The votes were rejected by the justices whom the clerk took to his assistance in making out the abstracts to be forwarded to the Governor; they were sent to the Governor in an irregular manner; and the paper called a return appeared, upon its face, to be defective in many important particulars.

The committee having rejected these votes, there was left a majority of seven votes in favor of the petitioner. It was then contended by the petitioner that he was entitled to the certificate of election, and ought, forthwith, to be admitted to a seat instead of John Scott, for the following reasons submitted by him in writing:

"The fifteenth section of the 'Act to regulate elections' in that Territory declares, 'that on or before the fifteenth day after the day of election, or sooner, in case all the returns be made, the clerk of the court of common pleas of the county, taking to his assistance two judges of the court of common pleas, or justices of the peace, or one of each, shall proceed to open the several returns which have been made to his office, and make abstracts of votes in the following manner: The abstract of votes for Delegate to Congress shall be on one sheet, and the abstract of votes for Representatives shall be on another sheet, separate from the sheet on which the abstract of votes for Delegate is contained, and being signed by the judges or justices, or any two of them, shall be deposited in the clerk's office, and a copy thereof, certified under the official seal of such clerk, shall be transmitted by express to the Governor of the Territory, or to the person exercising the government thereof. And it shall be the duty of the Governor, or person exercising the government for the time being, within thirty days after the expiration of the time hereinbefore allowed for making county returns, to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as may have made returns, for each person voted for as Delegate to Congress; and shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation, declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be elected as Delegate to represent this Territory in the House of Representatives of the United States, and to grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the Territory, to the person so elected.' The duty enjoined upon the Governor is to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as may have made returns, for each person voted for as the Delegate to Congress, and shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation, declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be elected as Delegate to represent the Territory in the House of Representatives of the United States, and to grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the Territory, to the person so elected. It is not the duty of the Governor to cast up and arrange votes not returned to him according to the provisions of that section of the law. The votes meant or intended to be cast up are such as are contained in the abstracts made by the justices and clerk, or any two of them, from the several returns of the election from the different townships to the clerk's office of the county, as contained in the poll-books; which abstracts shall have been deposited in the clerk's office, and a copy thereof, certified under the official seal of the clerk, transmitted by express to the Governor; he is not empowered or required to cast up votes contained in the return made to the clerk's office, nor ought he to cast up votes contained in a paper which is not an abstract; indeed, he has no authority to do it. It is upon a copy of the abstracts of votes certified under the official seal of the clerk, and transmitted by express to the Governor within the time prescribed by law, and upon that alone, that he is called to act. He cannot make abstracts of votes himself, nor ought he to receive any made by others not authorized to make abstracts; and if he sanctions such unwarrantable acts by casting and arranging, under the law, the votes they are supposed to contain, he violates a law which ought rigidly to be carried into execution, and tramples upon the rights of the community.

"There can be no doubt that, by the abstracts sent to the Governor, Rufus Easton had the highest number of votes. The Governor counted for Rufus Easton 1,800 votes and for John Scott 1,793; besides those supposed to be contained in the paper from Cote Sans Dessein, which is rejected—it is a nullity. It was then the bounden duty of the Governor, enjoined upon him by law, sanctioned by his own signature, to have granted a certificate of election to the said Rufus Easton. This the Governor refused to do, as will appear from a notice and request served on him the 24th September last. And for this injury what is the remedy? It is not to be found in the Territorial Government, where public opinion has scarcely any influence upon a Territorial Governor.

"There is a maxim, founded on the principles of universal justice, that 'there is no wrong without a remedy, and no right but what may be enforced.' From my own experience in life, I am inclined to believe the maxim would be much more correct and true, if it should read, 'there should be no wrong without a remedy, and no right but what ought to be enforced.' And how is this wrong to be righted, and the remedy enforced, but by making the person entitled to the certificate of election the sitting member? I have been told that it is the parliamentary practice of Great Britain, that when a person has been wrongfully returned, the person who ought to have been returned is entitled to become the sitting member, and leave it to the opposite party to contest. The distinction is a plain one. In cases where the person returned comes rightfully by the certificate of election, then he ought to keep his seat, till it is shown that he is not entitled to it; but where the person comes wrongfully by the certificate, in such cases he is not entitled to it, it is the property of another; the seat belongs to another; and that other ought not to be kept out of it upon a mere supposition. The parliamentary rule of practice of Great Britain would have very little weight or influence with me, should I be called upon to decide, except when founded on the immutable principles of justice. But if I am correct as to what their practice is, in this particular it is the practice of right; and so far it ought to be regarded as a practice fit to be adopted into a republican Government. I would listen to the rules and practice of Great Britain, and adopt them if just and reasonable, and reject whatever might be the offspring of injustice and oppression.

"The present case is, perhaps, a novel one; a case without a parallel and without a precedent. It is not a case like that of Isaac Williams and Isaac Williams, junior, or Charles Turner and Charles Turner, junior. In these two cases the decision of the question of fact, as to the votes being given for one and the same person, decided the whole contest; and had the question there been made, Who ought to have been returned? the result would have been the same. The question, Who ought to be the sitting member? could not be decided without determining, in the same instant, which was entitled to the seat. And, in the case of Kelly* and Harris, it does not appear from the record of proceedings that the point was made.

"The case under consideration is altogether of a different character. It is a territorial case, not likely to occur or happen under any Government where public opinion has its proper influence; which will always correct the evil and enforce the remedy.

"The question here, Who ought to have been returned? is a separate and distinct question, one that can be decided without determining or touching the main question. It is one which will, as nearly as can be expected, give the remedy. It is a question, if the returning officer erred, What ought the House of Representatives to do? Will not the immediate Representatives of a free, independent, and enlightened people, whose laws, maxims, and practice are founded on the universal and unchangeable principles of justice, correct the error, and place the party in the situation he ought to have been placed under the law? It is simply a question to be decided from the abstracts of votes returned into the Executive office according to law."

The committee being of opinion that the application of the petitioner ought not to be granted, proceeded in the investigation. The sitting delegate objected against the poll in the township of Maniteau, in the county of Howard, because the votes were given viva voce. This objection was not supported by evidence, and is not apparent from an inspection of the poll. In the township of St. Charles, in the county of St. Charles, he objected;

1. That the votes were not cast up and arranged by the judges of the election as the law directs.

2. That the votes were not counted.

3. That the same magistrates acted as judges of the election, and as assistants to the clerk in making his return.

The first and second objections were altogether unsupported by evidence, and the third was overruled by the committee. The election law does not prohibit judges of the election acting as assistants to the clerk in making his returns to the Governor.

* In this case it is probable the error in casting up the votes did not appear to the Governor, or was not to be discovered upon the face of the abstracts certified to him; if so, Harris came rightfully by the certificate.

DECEMBER, 1816.

Commissioner of Claims.

H. OF R.

In the townships of Saline and Big river, in the county of St. Genevieve, he objected against the returns. In the first, because the return appears blank, as neither the judges nor the clerk signed it; because it is otherwise informal, and because it appears to have been only a poll-book, stating, "Easton 19, Scott 14," without designating for Delegate to Congress. In Big river township, because it is not certified that the clerks were sworn; that the only evidence showing when the election was held is to be inferred from the date of the qualification of the judges. The only evidence in support of these objections was, an extra-official note or memorandum thereof, made by the clerk of the county of St. Genevieve, on the abstracts sent by him to the Governor. The committee considered this evidence altogether insufficient to establish the objections. If the facts existed, as alleged by the sitting Delegate, they might have been proved by the official copies of the poll-books, on file in the office of the clerk. He further objected against the poll in the township of St. Michael, in the same county, because it was closed at two instead of six P. M. No proof was adduced in support of this objection.

In the township of Bellevue, in the county of Washington, he objected against the poll, because the votes were given viva voce; and because one of the judges of the election administered the oath of office to himself. Neither of these objections were proved to the satisfaction of the committee.

In the township of Concord, in the same county, he objected against the poll, because the votes were not written or extended at length in the return of the judges of the election, but were set down informally; and because the votes were given viva voce. These objections were, in the opinion of the committee, altogether unsupported by the evidence.

The committee then proceeded to consider the objections made by the petitioner. In the township of Cinq Hommes, in the county of St. Genevieve, the petitioner objected against the poll—

1. Because William Tucker was appointed a judge of the election by Barnabas Burns, a justice of the peace, or by the other two judges, whereas, by law, it was the duty of the justice himself, being present, to act in that capacity.

2. Because the votes were not cast up and set down in writing, as the law directs, but stated in figures only.

Both these objections were overruled by the committee. As to the first, for aught that appears, Mr. Justice Burns may not have been present at the opening of the election, or, if present, he may have refused to serve as a judge, although he had the power of acting in that capacity. Tucker having been appointed a judge by nomination, the committee presumed that, in the words of the law, "there was no person present to act as a judge."

The second objection is satisfactorily proved. By an official copy of the original poll-book, certified by the county clerk, it appears that the return is stated, in figures, "for Rufus Easton 16, for John Scott 107." In the election law, it is enacted that "the number of votes given to each person shall be set down in writing at the foot of the poll-book." In this particular the words of the act were not literally complied with, but the variance relates only to form; no ambiguity is produced thereby, and, as far as the committee can discover, no injury is done to either party.

In the township of Breton, in the county of Washington, the petitioner objected against the poll, because

John Rice Jones, one of the judges, was appointed by the other two judges, when the place ought to have been filled by John Brickey, a justice of the peace, who was present at the election. The objection was overruled, for the reasons stated in relation to the first objection made to the poll in the township of Cinq Hommes.

In the township of German, in the county of Cape Girardeau, the petitioner objected to the return—1. Because the clerks of the election were not sworn; 2. Because there is no certificate of the clerk's being sworn prefixed to the poll-book, as required by law.

The first objection was not supported by any affirmative evidence; the second was overruled by the committee. Although the certificate is not made according to the letter of the law, yet a majority of the committee being of opinion, from inspecting a certified copy of the original poll, that the clerks were in fact sworn, decided against rejecting the return.

The committee having disposed of the objections above mentioned, an application was made by the sitting Delegate for further time to procure copies of the poll-books from the several townships in the counties of St. Genevieve, Cape Girardeau, New Madrid, Lawrence, and Arkansas, for the purpose of proving that the polls in the several townships in which majorities had been given for the petitioner had been kept in an irregular manner; that the judges in the township of Tywapiity had closed the polls before six o'clock, and that, in many instances, the returns were defective upon the face of them.

The election was held throughout the Territory of Missouri on the 5th day of August last. The Governor having granted to the sitting Delegate a certificate of his election, the petitioner, on the 24th of September last, served upon him a notice of his intention of contesting his election. On the 28th of the same month, the sitting Delegate notified the petitioner of the times and places at which he proposed taking depositions to support his election, commencing on the 12th October last, and ending on the 14th February next. Five months have nearly elapsed since the election in the said Territory, and more than three since the sitting Delegate was notified by the petitioner that his election would be contested. The committee were of opinion that sufficient time had been allowed to procure copies of the poll-books from every township in the Territory, and that the application of the sitting Delegate for further time ought not to be granted. Thereupon, it was contended by the sitting Delegate, that, by rejecting the votes in the township of Cote Sans Dessein, the candidate would become entitled to a seat who had not a majority of voices in his favor; and therefore the election should be set aside, and a new one ordered. The committee did not concur in this opinion.

Upon a view of the whole premises, the committee respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That John Scott is not entitled to a seat in this House as Delegate from the Territory of Missouri.

Resolved, That Rufus Easton is entitled to a seat in this House as Delegate from the said Territory.

COMMISSIONER OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the select committee appointed to investigate the decisions of Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims for lost property, &c., made a report, stating, that the great mass of documents, connected with the evidence in eight hundred decisions, render it impossible to investigate the whole of them, and presuming that such examination was not contemplated by the House, concluded with a resolution that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of said decisions.

On the question of concurring with the committee in their report, and consequently to discharge them from further consideration of the subject referred to them, a warm debate ensued, of a character nearly the same as that heretofore reported on this subject, which continued nearly an hour; a brief view of which will embrace all the points argued or urged in the debate.

Mr. FORSYTH rose first in opposition to the report. As the committee had been raised to inquire generally into the decisions of the Commissioner, he thought they ought to perform their duty and report some opinion to the House. Such an investigation was highly necessary, as he thought it had been clearly established that the Commissioner had departed widely from correctness in his decisions; he wished not to do injustice to that officer, but he believed he had grossly erred—the report of the Commissioner himself proved it, as it was apparent that he had substituted his own idea of justice for the letter of the law, and he had no notion this inquiry should be smothered under a mass of papers; the labor would be less gigantic than the committee seemed to think it, and the subject ought to be thoroughly sifted for the benefit of the nation.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Kentucky, would vote for the report from a conviction that it was right. So far as he was acquainted with the decisions of the Commissioner, he had acted properly, and had guarded the public treasure vigilantly. Mr. F. had himself brought on several claims, some of which the Commissioner had rejected, which Mr. F. thought ought to have passed. The private character of Mr. Lee he had never heard impeached. Why urge the committee to wade through eight hundred decisions? It was competent for the House to regulate the ninth section of the act, but if the law be suspended it would amount to a denial of justice.

Mr. MILLS was also in favor of agreeing to the report, which he defended at some length. For what purpose should the committee undertake the Herculean task urged upon them by the gentleman from Georgia? Many of the cases would singly require three days for a proper examination; and was this to be done, to ascertain whether this poor Commissioner had transcended his powers in cases where no error was alleged? Before this committee was appointed, the subject had been referred to the Committee of Claims—that committee had examined the most important papers, and reported on certain cases which had thrown light on the subject, and had anticipated the select committee, and this rendered further inquiry useless, &c. Mr. M. adverted to the reprobated decisions of the Commissioner, and argued to show that rumor had done him injustice, and that his proceedings had not been so erroneous as was represented.

Mr. WILLIAMS followed in favor of the report, and of discharging the committee from the subject. It was not in the nature of things that the committee could, consistently with their other duties, take up one by one the mass of cases and decide on them; nor would any good result to the House or the nation from it, if they even possessed the strength to do it, as it would be reporting what had been already reported by the Committee of Claims. This business had been involved in much perplexity by the creation of two committees on nearly the same subject—he would not say the other had gone out of its province, but it had relieved the select committee from much labor. Mr. W. repeated, he could not see any good in further considering what had already been brought before the House by another committee, and, if they were to come to different conclusions, how would it appear to have two committees arrayed against each other?

Mr. HULBERT thought it proper the committee should be discharged from the further consideration, because there was no necessity for their going through the seven hundred horse cases, and it would give the House no information to have another report on the three cases so specially brought before them already. He had sufficient evidence that gross misconduct had taken place—it was the duty of the House to interfere, and he wished no further report to make up his mind.

Mr. FORSYTH said, in reply, that this business had not been voluntarily thrown on the select committee. It had been solicited by gentlemen who now thought it unnecessary, but they ought not to shrink from a duty they had asked to be imposed on them. It was incorrect that the same subject was referred to two committees—the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the law, and the select committee appointed on the man—this committee say the Commissioner had acted erroneously, but do not say whether intentionally or not; it was their duty to report on this point, and say whether there was evidence of corruption, &c.

Mr. ROSS moved to lay the report on the table. The duty of the committee had been correctly stated, he said, by Mr. FORSYTH—though he himself had no doubt of the integrity of the Commissioner. Mr. R. argued at some length to show that it was due to the character of the officer, which had already suffered much by the course of the discussions on this subject, as well as to the House and the nation, to show whether his imputed errors were unintentional or corrupt; if the former, that his fame should be freed from the insinuations made against him, and if the latter, that he should not be allowed to proceed in deciding on claims so important as were yet to be acted on.

Mr. ROSS's motion to lay the report on the table was lost.

Mr. WILDE spoke against agreeing to the report, because he was always in favor of the committees and the members of the House performing their duty strictly and faithfully. Mr. W. referred to the suspension of a part of the law by the President of the United States, and to the proposition now pending to repeal it; and thought it was first proper to ascertain whether the fault was in the law, or in its administration. He did not wish the Commissioner to be legislated out of office unless he was corrupt, and for that reason he wished his conduct to be thoroughly investigated by the committee appointed to perform that duty.

After some additional remarks and rejoinders by Messrs. FORSYTH, MILLS, and WILLIAMS, and some remarks by Mr. W. P. MACLAY, the question, on concurring in the report of the select committee, was taken, and carried without a division.

The documents were then, on motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, referred to a Committee of the Whole.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the act making compensation for property lost, &c. during the late war—Mr. JOHNSON's amendment being still under consideration.

The debate on this subject was resumed by Mr. WRIGHT, and continued until the House adjourned, but which can only be given here in a summary view.

Mr. WRIGHT rose in opposition to the report of the Committee of Claims, the adoption of which would be outrageously unjust to the Commissioner, who would be the victim of clamor, which it was always easy to raise, an instance of which he cited in the clamor against the Chief Justice of the United States, respecting his decision in the case of Aaron Burr, when the inquiry was instituted whether it was in the law or the administration of it, that the accused escaped punishment; and yet we all know, said Mr. W., how fair the character of that exalted officer now stands. He believed no man could have walked with more caution than Mr. Lee had in performing his duty, which opinion he justified by a review from the Commissioner's report of his proceedings, and his efforts to act properly in fulfilling his trust; and he called on the House to examine that conduct as here developed, and they would have reason to esteem and respect the officer. He asked gentlemen if they, if any man, could proceed more earnestly in search of light to guide them to a correct construction of the law and its correct administration. He had manifested the greatest deliberation, and after seeking advice of those who were authorized to give it, he received directions to act precisely as he had acted. Mr. W. also referred successively and particularly to the circumstances of the three cases reported by the Committee of Claims, and urged as the most objectionable, and justified them as legal and proper, from the nature of the claims and the evidence adduced, and was of opinion that the Commissioner had, in these cases, done what he ought to have done, and had done nothing which he ought not to have done; but even admitting error in his decisions, it was the error of the Government, not of the Commissioner; that it was admitted he had correctly decided in near eight hundred decisions, and only three were thought erroneous, &c. Of the law officer of the Government he had sought advice in construing the law, by whom it was refused; then of the Executive, by whom after two months' delay, he had been instructed to proceed exactly as he had done. Touching the cases which had been suspended, Mr. W. was of opinion that we ought to take example from the enemy, and pay all losses incurred by the war, and that sufferings sustained in a common cause, ought to be borne equally by the nation. On the question before the House, he hoped the amendment would prevail, and that in a business so important two additional Commissioners might be appointed. Mr. W. illustrated his opinions by various arguments drawn from the laws of nations, our own laws, &c. Mr. W. concluded his speech a little after four o'clock, when the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion, the House adjourned until Thursday next.

THURSDAY, January 2, 1817.

Another member, to wit: from the State of Virginia, JOHN G. JACKSON, appeared and took his seat.

A new member, to wit: from the State of South Carolina, STEPHEN D. MILLER, in the room of William Mayrant, resigned, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate "for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," reported the same with amendments, and the bill and amendments were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, it was ordered that, in the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections on the petition of Rufus Easton, contesting the right of Mr. SCOTT, (sitting Delegate from Missouri,) Mr. Easton shall be allowed a seat at the bar of the House in support of his petition.

Mr. LOWNDES moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to satisfy the claims of the friendly Creek Indians, whose property was plundered by the hostile Creek Indians, in consequence of the destruction of their property by the United States.

Mr. L. stated the grounds on which this motion was founded to be, that an expectation had been held out to them, during the negotiation of a treaty with them, that such allowance would be made; which intimation had been a strong inducement to them to sign the treaty between them and the United States, which has since become the law of the land.

The resolve was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of William Haslett was read a third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. LOWNDES made a report on the petition of C. H. Sanders and Manuel Judah, which was read and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

That it is the object of the petition to procure a remission or repayment of duties which the petitioners have either secured or paid to the Government on account of spirits distilled within the United States. The ground of their claim is the destruction of these articles by fire.

The principle involved in this claim will probably materially affect the decision of many petitions which have been referred to the committee, and they have supposed that this consideration required that they should examine the subject with the utmost attention, and would excuse them for explaining their views of it more fully in their report than they have usually done in cases of private petitions.

The duties in question, like all indirect taxes, are considered by the petitioners as intended to fall upon consumption. Though paid upon the importation or manufacture of the article, they are designed only to operate as deductions from the income of the last purchaser—the consumer. But, where the article is destroyed, to make him pay the whole who it was not calculated either by the Government or himself should pay any part, seems the more unreasonable, as the loss makes an opening in the market for the same article; so that the Government, without injury to the merchant, may receive its fair contribution, proportioned to the consumption and resources of the country, and equal to what it would have been if the first article had not been destroyed.

Such are the arguments which may be employed in favor of the relief which is asked. The committee feel that in many cases such relief cannot be denied without much pain, but they think it cannot be granted without imprudence.

It is not denied that there would be some advantage in so laying the duty upon consumable articles that Government should receive its contribution, where he who buys for consumption makes his purchase. The duty would in this way add less to the price of the article, and nothing to the risk of mercantile operations. But it could be enforced only by a system of excise so rigorous and extensive that our attachment to civil liberty would make us reject it, independently of the difficulties which the sparse population of the country would oppose to its execution. Duties, then, upon consumable articles must be imposed upon their importation or manufacture, and the holder of them, upon paying the duty, finds their value as really enhanced as it would be by any equal expenditure for their security or transportation. Is it unjust that his whole property in the article, when enhanced in value, should be liable to the same dangers that it was before; that the money paid for its purchase, or for the duty upon it, should be sacrificed either by the want of vigilance which might have prevented its loss, or of prudence which might have secured the indemnity which the practice of insurance affords? The owner of the article has its custody, its disposition, the power of insuring it. The committee do not think that there is in the rule which throws the loss of the money paid for duties as well as the purchase-money upon the holder, an injustice which obliges the Legislature to abandon it at the hazard of encouraging such extensive frauds upon the revenue as a rigorous system of excise could alone repress.

If, indeed, the destruction of any article of merchandise in possession of the importer or manufacturer, on which duty has been paid, gives to him a claim to its repayment, every purchaser of similar merchandise for consumption or speculation, having paid the same duty in the shape of an enhanced price of the article, has the same substantial claim upon the justice of the Government.

It may be proper to remark that Congress have hitherto shown great unwillingness to relax the rule, the necessity of which the committee have endeavored to support. Applications of the same nature as that which is the subject of this report have probably been numerous in every session. But a few instances of the remission of tonnage duty where foreign vessels have been forced into our ports; two cases of remission of duties on the ground of peculiar misfortunes; a power given to the Secretary of the Treasury to remit unequal duties payable under a law which the same act suspended; and the remission of duties on tea in the custody (as the act expresses it) of the Government;—these are the only cases known to the committee in which the Government has remitted the duties which have accrued to it.

In a few instances, a prolongation of the credit upon revenue bonds has been accorded in cases of general calamity.

The committee recommend to the House a resolution that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

AMERICAN FLAG.

Mr. WENDOVER from the select committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States, made a detailed report, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill to alter the flag of the United States, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

The committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States, beg leave to report:

That they have maturely examined the subject submitted for their consideration, and are well aware that any proposition essentially to alter the flag of the United States, either in its general form or in the distribution of its parts, would be as unacceptable to the Legislature and to the people, as it would be uncongenial with the views of the committee.

Fully persuaded that the form selected for the American flag was truly emblematical of our origin and existence as an independent nation, and that, as such, it has received the approbation and support of the citizens of the Union, it ought to undergo no change that would decrease its conspicuity, or tend to deprive it of its representative character. The committee however believe that a change in the number of States in the Union sufficiently indicates the propriety of such a change in the arrangement of the flag as shall best accord with the reasons that led to its adoption, and sufficiently point to important periods of our history.

The original flag of the United States was composed of thirteen stripes and thirteen stars, and was adopted by a resolution of the Continental Congress, on the 14th June, 1777. On the 13th January, 1794, after two new States had been admitted into the Union, the National Legislature passed an act that the stripes and stars should, on a day fixed, be increased to fifteen each, to comport with the then number of independent States. The accession of new States since that alteration, and the certain prospect that at no distant period the number of States will be considerably multiplied, render it, in the opinion of the committee, highly inexpedient to increase the number of stripes, as every flag must in some measure be limited in its size from the circumstance of convenience to the place on which it is to be displayed, while such an increase would necessarily decrease their magnitude, and render them proportionably less distinct to distant observation. This consideration has induced many to retain only the general form of the flag, while there actually exists a great want of uniformity in its adjustment, particularly when used on small private vessels.

JANUARY, 1817.

The national flag being in general use by vessels of almost every description, it appears to the committee of considerable importance to adopt some arrangement calculated to prevent, in future, great or extensive alterations. Under these impressions, they are led to believe no alteration could be made more emblematical of our origin and present existence, as composed of a number of independent and united States, than to reduce the stripes to the original thirteen, representing the number of States then contending for and happily achieving their independence—and to increase the stars to correspond with the number of States now in the Union—and hereafter to add one star to the flag whenever a new State shall be fully admitted.

These slight alterations will, in the opinion of the committee, meet the general approbation as well of those who may have regretted a former departure from the original flag and such as are solicitous to see in it a representation of every State in the Union.

The committee cannot believe, that in retaining only thirteen stripes, it necessarily follows they should be distinctly considered in reference to certain individual States, inasmuch as nearly all the new States were a component part of and represented in the original States, and inasmuch also as the flag is intended to signify numbers, and not local and particular sections of the Union.

JUDGE TOULMIN.

The SPEAKER offered to the House certain documents, transmitted to him by Edwin Lewis, of the Mississippi Territory, embracing charges of official misconduct in Harry Toulmin, one of the judges of that Territory. There accompanied the papers no memorial or petition, asking the attention of Congress to the subject; but simply a letter from Mr. Lewis, to the Speaker, requesting him to lay the papers before the House, and stating his ability to substantiate the allegations against Judge Toulmin, which papers, the SPEAKER, as he was bound to do by its rules, laid before the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR objected to receiving the papers in the shape in which they were offered to the House, not wishing to give to any unknown and irresponsible individual a chance of throwing into the House whatever calumny he might choose against a public officer.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the reading of the papers offered, and proceeded to declare his dissent from the objection made by Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. R. was ignorant of the parties; the charges might be a calumny. Such was the prevalence of slander, that, on the first blush of an accusation against the character of a respectable citizen, it was believed a slander. He meant not to be the exhorter or the instructor of the House, or to reprove its neglects; but the relation in which the House stood to the community, it had no right to disregard, and that relation gave every citizen a right to be heard. This House, like the English House of Commons, had been called the grand inquest of the nation. What, he asked, would be said of a grand jury who should receive an information of this kind, and because it was presented by this or that man, would have nothing to do with it? They might know the accused to be an upright man, and the accuser to be a madman; in that light they might disregard it; but in this case he knew neither the complainant nor the citizen complained of, and he thought the interest of the individual, as well as the respect due to our courts of justice, required that the subject should be inquired into. He should be sorry to see this House, from supineness or indifference, pass by a formal complaint from a citizen against a public officer, and should consider it a most inauspicious sign of the times. Among kings, he was considered as performing well who never shut his ears to the complaints of his subjects—and ours, Mr. R. said, should not be closed against the meanest citizen.

The papers were then read.

The reading of the papers having been finished, a motion was made by Mr. GROSVENOR, that Mr. LEWIS should have leave to withdraw his papers. This motion was superseded by a motion by Mr. WEBSTER to refer the papers to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On this question there arose a desultory debate, which occupied three hours, the importance of which does not appear to require its being reported at length. A brief summary of the course of the debate will afford sufficient information of the principal points it involved.

Mr. GROSVENOR commenced the discussion by condemning the serious reception of a memorial, which bore on the face of it marks of prejudice and passion, and neither supported by such evidence as entitled it to the respect of the House, nor by the avouchment of any member to the probable truth of its contents, or to the character of the memorialist. Under such circumstances, to refer the papers would subject the House to daily imposition from every vagabond who had malice and wit enough to string together accusations of a criminal nature against any officer of the Government, no matter how elevated his station.

Mr. RANDOLPH took a widely different view of the subject. He considered the right of petition to be proposed to be invaded by the objections taken by Mr. GROSVENOR to acting on those papers. Of the character of the memorialist he knew nothing, nor was it material, he contended, on the question of instituting an inquiry into the conduct of a public officer. In support of which doctrine he adduced various illustrations, drawn from the practice before grand juries of finding bills on ex parte information, and on the accusation of professed informers, the most despicable of the human race. In this country, he argued, every individual had the same right as Mr. Jefferson, (late President,) who in his communication to Congress, after Burr's trial, had recommended to Congress to inquire whether the defect was in the evidence, in the law, or in the administration of the law—a recommendation as regarded the latter, which, Mr. R. said, any other member of society had the same right to make as the President. Mr. R. opposed Mr. GROSVENOR's general view of the modifications and limitation of the right of petition, and adduced illustrations from British Parliamentary history to show the sanctity of the right of petition, according to the practice of that body, &c. Some of the charges in this memorial were of a serious nature, and susceptible of easy proof or refutation; and he was clearly in favor of giving a due examination to the subject.

Mr. WEBSTER supported the general view taken by Mr. RANDOLPH, and urged the reference of the papers as containing serious matter of inquiry. It was sufficient to secure attention by the House to a petition, that it was respectful in its terms to the House, and decent in the subject-matter. Mr. W. referred, also, to the practice of the House of Commons, and as a strong illustration introduced the case of a person (a member of the House of Commons, indeed, but that did not change the principle) who came from the pillory to that House, and was heard on an accusation against the Chief Justice.

Mr. McKEE was opposed to the reference of these papers on the ground that a similar accusation, preferred in 1810 against Judge Toulmin, had been found to be frivolous; and such, he thought, there was a presumption amounting almost to certainty, was the fact in the present instance.

Mr. GROSVENOR again took the floor against the reference, in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH on the right of petition, which he would be the last to deny; but the right of petition did not embrace an obligation on the House to examine any charge against public officers, which malice or petulance might dictate. He referred to the various charges made, and inferred from the face of the memorial that they were either wholly false, or distorted into a shape the facts did not warrant.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, would have consented to a reference of this memorial, did he not believe that the high character of Judge Toulmin, whilst in Kentucky, and so far as he had since heard of him, was such as to forbid the belief that there was any ground for the accusation against him; in which conviction he was confirmed by the information given by Mr. McKEE, that this was not the first time the same person had impeached the conduct of the judge. He was therefore opposed to a reference of the papers.

Mr. RANDOLPH again, at some length, explained his views of the right of petition, and of having petitions examined, and supported the proposition for a reference to a committee.

Mr. SOUTHARD followed on the same side. He thought such high charges advanced, some of them under oath, ought not to be disregarded by the House; for, if one-fourth of them were true, they afforded ample ground for impeachment of the judge. The subject ought at least to be examined.

Mr. WILDE opposed the reference of the papers, on the ground of his total disbelief in the statements of the memorialist. In allusion to the probability that the charges flowed from a spirit of animosity to Judge Toulmin on account of his official conduct, Mr. W. thought it very probable the fact was so; for, said he,

What rogue e'er felt the halter draw,
With good opinion of the law!

The absence of evidence, so easily to have been obtained if the charges had been true, was a strong reason with Mr. W. for disbelieving them.

Mr. ROBERTSON made some forcible remarks in favor of the inquiry. He gave to the character of Judge Toulmin, as an intelligent judge and good citizen, its due praise. The Judge lived in a country divided into virulent factions; he had many enemies, many friends. The estimation in which the mass of the people held him, was proved by his being deputed by them to this city, whither he was now on his way, to represent their views respecting the erection of the Territory into a State. On the other hand, Mr. R. said, he knew nothing of Mr. Lewis, but from repeated letters to him on the subject, which proved that those charges were not of sudden creation, but long meditated. Making it a rule to answer all letters addressed to him, Mr. R. said, he had referred Mr. Lewis to Congress, as the proper body to redress his supposed grievances. Mr. R. said he thought it due to Mr. Lewis, but more due to Judge Toulmin, that an inquiry should take place, and put an end at once to all doubts which any man may entertain on the subject. He should, therefore, with a sincere disposition to do justice to Judge Toulmin, cheerfully vote for the reference of the memorial.

Mr. CULPEPER stated his knowledge of Mr. Lewis's family in North Carolina, as being respectable, &c., and said he had frequently heard before of Mr. Lewis's complaints against Judge Toulmin.

The question on reference of the papers to the Judiciary Committee was determined in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, January 3.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to provide for the erection of a court-house, and public offices, within the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an additional judicial district in the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory, to be composed of the counties of Washington, Clark, and Monroe, together with such other counties as the Legislature of the Territory may lay off between the rivers Tennessee and Alabama.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the act, passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war and for other purposes," as to extend the time in which guardians of the minor children of deceased soldiers may relinquish the bounty land and claim the half pay, as provided by the second section of the act aforesaid.

Mr. PARRIS, in offering the above resolution for consideration, observed, that, by advertising to the second section of the act of the last session, authorizing the guardians of the minor children of deceased soldiers to relinquish their claim to the bounty land, and receive in lieu thereof half pay for five years, it would be perceived that unless such relinquishment was made previous to the 16th of April next, the heirs would be forever barred from accepting the benefit of that act. He had no doubt that there were many suffering families of the deceased soldiers of the late war, to whom the provisions of the second section of that act had never been made known; many orphans who were yet ignorant of the provisions which were the last session made for their relief. He had no doubt but the same disposition which was manifested in passing the act, would induce the House to extend its provisions, that the destitute families of the soldiers who had died in our service might find some small relief in our munificence. He in fact had good reason to believe that, in the remote section of the Union which he had the honor to represent, an extension of the time would be particularly desirable, as there were many who had not availed themselves of the provisions of the act of the last session, before alluded to, that he was certain would have done it long since, had they been informed of its existence.

On motion of Mr. CLENDENNIN, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing the widows and orphans of the non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates of militia and volunteers, who died in the service of the United States previous to the 31st day of December, 1812, to be placed on the pension roll at the same rate as the widows and orphans of the above described corps, who died subsequently to the said 31st day of December, 1812.

On motion of Mr. DICKENS, the Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the relief of such of the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, who faithfully served, and are now reduced to want, and unable to support themselves.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, it was ordered that the Message from the President of the United States, received by this House on the 18th day of January, 1816, recommending the confirmation of certain grants of land made by the friendly Creek Indians to General Jackson, Benjamin Hawkins, and others, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections, on the petition of Rufus Easton; which report pronounces Mr. SCOTT, the sitting Delegate from Missouri Territory, not entitled, and Mr. Easton, the petitioner, to be entitled to a seat in this House. [The committee, it appears, have framed their report on the ground of gross and undeniable illegality of the election in one of the districts in the Territory; which election being set aside by the committee, gave a majority of votes to the petitioner—and, without going into the examination of individual votes, or the qualification of the voters, the election being by ballot, they declare in favor of the petitioner.]

The report and documents being read, the Committee rose and reported progress, and were refused leave to sit again; thus bringing the subject immediately before the House.

Mr. WEBSTER opposed the report, principally on the ground of its being predicated only on illegality in a separate election, without entering into an examination of the qualifications of the voters generally; and concluded by moving the recommitment of the report to the Committee of Elections, with instructions "to receive evidence that persons voting for either candidate were not entitled to vote in the said election."

On this motion a wide debate took place, chiefly on the point whether votes given by ballot, and of course privately, could be afterwards ascertained, or the voter called in to declare for whom he had voted, when the very object of the mode was to afford secrecy and freedom to the elector; also on the eligibility of elections by ballot or of those viva voce, and on the propriety of reversing an election without first ascertaining the legality of the votes which decided it. Besides these main questions in the debate, it embraced an inquiry into the particular circumstances of the case at issue, and many incidental points, by the various speakers.

Those gentlemen who advocated the recommitment, were Messrs. WEBSTER, RANDOLPH, SHEPHERD, CALHOUN, PITKIN, TELFAIR, and THOMAS; and those opposed to it, Messrs. TAYLOR of New York, PICKERING, WRIGHT, and ROSS.

Mr. CADY doubted very strongly whether the Delegates from the Territory could be considered as officers of the General Government, but rather as mere agents for the Territories, allowed by courtesy to sit and speak in the House, without anything to do with the general concerns of the nation; and their election therefore not properly coming before the House. He, therefore, moved to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH also questioned the propriety of considering the Delegates in any other light than mere agents of the Territories, without any title to the privileges of the members, which they now enjoyed, (except the right of voting,) and was in favor of laying the report on the table.

On the question to lay the report on the table, the ayes and noes were equal, being each 68, and the SPEAKER decided against the motion.

The question then recurring on the recommitment, much more discussion followed; after which, the petitioner (as allowed by a vote of the House) rose to support his pretensions; when, on motion, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, January 4.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that such persons as have settled upon public lands in that Territory, may be permitted to remain thereon until the same shall be exposed to sale.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill directing the discharge of Oliver Spellman from imprisonment, which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the select committee, appointed on the 30th ult., reported a bill extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for giving further time to complete the surveys and to obtain patents for lands located under Virginia resolution warrants; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the navigation of the Muscle Shoals, in Tennessee river.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the petition of Rufus Easton, contesting the right of John Scott to a seat in the House as a delegate from Missouri Territory.

Mr. EASTON (the petitioner) rose for the purpose of defending his right to a seat in the House. He spoke on the subject at considerable length, and examined the various points and bearings of the case.

When Mr. EASTON concluded—

Mr. BETTS, of New York, on the ground of his belief that the Delegates from Territories cannot be considered members of this House, and that of course the House is not the proper judge of the correctness of the returns of their election, moved that the subject should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, opposed the motion, and repelled, with some force of expression, the idea of the unimportance of the Delegates, which some gentlemen appeared to entertain. The people of the frontier country had rights as well as the people of the States, of which distance ought not to deprive them; and their Delegates (or Representatives) had duties to perform here as important to their constituents, as essential to the rights of the citizen, as any member of this House. It was therefore of high importance that they should be represented by the person who had a majority of their votes; and that the House should determine that question.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, thought, with Mr. ROBERTSON, that the House were bound to decide between the sitting member and the petitioner. He then went on to discuss the merits of the question before the House, on the report of the committee.

Mr. BETTS spoke again in support of his motion, and further explained his views on the question he had raised.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, seconded Mr. BETTS's views. The Delegates, being unknown to the Constitution, and authorized by the law only, which law did not prescribe or restrain the right of judging of the legality of their election, Mr. McKEE concluded that the House had no right to examine into the subject, but were bound to take the return as conclusive evidence of the election.

Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, controverted this doctrine. The right of judging of the correctness of the returns, he contended, arose from the nature of things; otherwise the right of election, allowed by law to the people, would, in fact, be adjudged to belong to the Governor, the returning officer in this case, who might, without appeal from his decision, return whom he pleased as the Delegate.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, supported the opposite side of the question, from a conviction which had grown upon him, from consideration and examination, since the question was first presented to the House. Mr. G. quoted the laws on this subject, and contended that the House had no power judicially to decide on the qualification or right of a Delegate to a seat in this House, since a Delegate was not a member of the House according to the Constitution, and there was no provision, in the laws authorizing the Territories to send Delegates, which gave to this House the power of revising the legality of their election. Mr. G. was not, however, in favor of indefinite postponement, thinking it but respectful to the people of the Territory and the petitioner to give more serious consideration to the question.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, spoke in reply to Mr. GASTON. If the return of a returning officer were to be conclusive evidence, he asked, in the course of his argument, what course would the gentleman pursue, if the returning officer should grant two certificates to different persons?—a thing by no means impossible. Should both be allowed to take their seats, or would not the House examine which of the two had the correct return? From the nature of things, Mr. W. contended, it could not be but it was the right and duty of the House to decide in cases of contested election of Delegates.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, took the same ground as Mr WEBSTER, which he argued at some length, and with much clearness, contending that the House either had jurisdiction or it had not; if it had not, it had no right to look at the return, for any purposes, or at the correspondence of the return with the member who took the seat; if it had jurisdiction, it had certainly a right to examine, on any point whatever, the validity of the return. Otherwise, the absurdity would follow, that any man whatever, claiming a seat as Delegate from a Territory, would have a right to take it; whether duly elected or not.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, spoke again in support of his views. He quoted cases from other grades of office, which he considered as analogous to that embraced in the question before the House; that, for instance, of a Judge exhibiting a commission from the proper authority; into the legality of which his colleagues of the court have no power further to inquire, than that the certificate is in the usual form, and signed by the Executive authority.

Mr. SHEFFEY, of Virginia, denied the correctness of the doctrine, which, he said, had been broached on this occasion, and which, if sanctioned by the House, would lead to the most extraordinary consequences. Mr. S., besides the general grounds of opposition to the motion for postponement, was desirous to adhere to the precedent already established, by the House having in 1809 taken cognizance of a contested Territorial election; respecting which it was not at all material that it was not of the same nature as the present question; since, if the House had a right to inquire into the right of a Delegate to a seat on one ground, they had the same right on any other.

Mr. CADY, of New York, was against the expediency, if not the right of the House to inquire into the election of a Delegate. He instanced a case, which he contended was analogous—that of a foreign Minister, presenting to the President his credentials; suppose another person should present himself, and say that he was the real representative of his Government, the other having obtained his certificate by fraud. Would the President go into an examination of the relative right of each, and decide which was the true representative of the Government? Or would he not reject both, and refer them to their constituent authority to remedy the error, if any? Mr. C. was in favor of indefinite postponement.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, argued, from the right of the people of the Territories to have a Delegate on this floor, established by law and the Constitution, that they had a right to be correctly represented; and that, therefore, it was the right and duty of the House to inquire into the validity of their election, when contested.

The question on indefinite postponement was decided in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, contended, that the power of judging of the qualifications and returns of its own members (and Delegates were quasi members,) was inherent in every Legislative body, and not necessary to be expressly bestowed on it; and that, therefore, this House had ample power in the case before them. He argued the question at some length.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied to Mr. PICKERING and Mr. HARDIN, and contended against the power of the House in this respect. If it had the power, he contended, it was a concurrent power with the Senate, as the Delegates were to the Congress and not this House, though it had been deemed convenient and expedient to admit them to seats in this House rather than in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, taking for granted the right of the House on the subject, proceeded to the examination of the question, he conceived to be actually before the House, whether, on the facts reported by the committee, the sitting member or the petitioner was entitled to a seat in this House? Mr. S. was in favor, as the evidence presented itself to him, of the right of Mr. EASTON to a seat. If satisfied, by evidence now in possession of the sitting member, of bad votes having been given, he would be willing to recommit the report.

Mr. SCOTT (the sitting Delegate) stated, that there was now on the table evidence of one hundred and fifteen bad votes, eighty-seven of which were, by the evidence, fixed to have been given for the petitioner.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, defended the report of the Committee of Elections, contending, that the decision of the qualifications of voters at elections ought to be left to the judges of the election in the present case, and in most other cases of contested election; not because this House had not the power, but because it was not practicable for the House properly to scrutinize them. As to the qualifications of the voters, evidence was even now taking in some of the counties of the Territory, in regard to the qualification of voters, which could not arrive in time to be examined at this session, and which might present a totally different view of the relative good or bad votes. Mr. T. opposed the recommitment, and prayed the House to decide on the report of the committee.

After some further remarks by Mr. RANDOLPH in favor of recommitment—

The question on recommitment, as moved yesterday, was taken by yeas and nays, and decided—For recommitment 86, against it 50, as follows:

The question was then taken, "Shall the committee be instructed as aforesaid?" And also passed in the affirmative.

MONDAY, January 6.

Mr. MILLS presented a petition of the inhabitants of the town of Southampton, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that the mails may not be transported or opened on Sundays; which was ordered to be referred to a select committee; Mr. MILLS, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. McKEE, Mr. MARSH, and Mr. TYLER, were appointed the committee.

Mr. STEARNS presented a similar petition from the inhabitants of the district of Norfolk, in said State, which was referred to the committee last appointed.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Caze and Richard, which was read: when Mr. YANCEY reported a bill for the relief of James Caze and John Richard, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House a letter addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means, by the acting Secretary of War, enclosing detailed statements, on which were founded the estimates for the expenses of the Army of the United States, for the year 1817, including arrearages, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH submitted the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on the National Currency be instructed to inquire whether the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States have adopted any arrangement by which the payment of the specie portion of the second instalment can be evaded or postponed; and, if such arrangement has been made, the expediency of adopting some regulation by which the payment of the specie portion of the second instalment may be enforced at the time required by the act of incorporation, or within a limited time thereafter.

Ordered, That the committee to whom is referred the letter and report of the Acting Secretary of War, on the letter of Major General William Henry Harrison, respecting his expenditure of public money, while commanding the north-western army, during the late war with Great Britain, have power to send for persons and papers.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled, "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, and of Anthony Cruzat, and L. P. Deverges," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims, &c., expressing his regret at the omission to pursue the inquiry into his conduct, and courting further investigation; defending also his decisions, and particularly those three animadverted upon by the Committee of Claims in their report, and throwing himself on the justice of the House to rescue his character from unjust obloquy.

The letter having been read, was, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom had been referred the bill to amend the Claims law.

The engrossed bill to authorize the discharge of Oliver Spellman from his imprisonment, was read a third time, and passed.

TRANSFER OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House a letter addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means, by the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting the expediency of repealing so much of the act of the 3d March, 1809, as authorizes the President to transfer appropriations, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 1, 1817.

SIR: Your letter of the 21st ultimo, enclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo, directing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act "further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," passed the third of March, 1809, as authorizes the President of the United States to transfer appropriations, has been received.

In giving my opinion upon the subject-matter of the resolution, it may be proper to state the causes which led to the adoption of the law, embracing the provision which is contemplated to be repealed by the resolution. Antecedent to that period the appropriations were, by some of the Departments, considered as an aggregate sum to be applied, without distinction in their accounts, to every branch of service embraced by the appropriation. In the Navy Department, for instance, there was but one account opened in the Treasury books, because the requisitions made by the Department were drawn for the Navy Department generally, and the sums thus drawn were applied to the naval service, without regard to the amount which had been specifically appropriated for the different branches of the service within that Department.

In changing this practice, the necessity of giving the power to transfer from one head of appropriation to another, according to the exigencies of the service, was foreseen. This power was given to the President; and, in order to furnish to Congress the information which it was deemed essential to possess, every transfer of appropriation, together with the application of the money so transferred, was required to be communicated to Congress during the first week of their session thereafter. If no transfers were made, Congress knew the maximum applied to each head of appropriation. If transfers were made, they obtained information equally interesting and useful to them in providing for the wants of the succeeding year. The transfers disclosed to them those branches of the service, in each Department, where the appropriations had been redundant, as well as where they had been deficient. They obtained, without injury, a knowledge of the application of the sum transferred, as well as of the sum originally designated for that object. This was the desideratum intended to be obtained by the adoption of that measure.

By reducing the heads of appropriation, the necessity of exercising the power of transfer will, no doubt, be considerably diminished. During a period of peace, and after the Naval and Military Establishments have remained for a considerable time without alteration as to organization or force, it is probable that it will be but rarely exercised. It is believed, however, that a full consideration of the subject will lead to the conviction that the power ought to be retained in peace as well as in war. A change in our relations with a foreign State, during the recess of Congress, which would render it prudent to concentrate the regular force in any section of the country, would increase the expense of the Quartermaster's department beyond the regular appropriation. Expenses incurred under such circumstances must generally be discharged as they are incurred. This could not be effected without the power of applying the redundancies of other appropriations to meet the deficits produced by such an emergency.

There does not appear to be any necessity for extending this power to the permanent appropriations of the land or naval service. The appropriations for arming the militia, for the armories, and for arms and military stores, and for the permanent increase of the Navy, may with great propriety be exempted from the operation of this power. It is to the current expenses of the land and naval force authorized to be kept in service during the year that this power should be confined. Within those limits it is not believed that the power can be exercised to the injury of the nation. Without this power, the War and Navy Departments would be compelled to make ample estimates for every branch of the service, as a deficiency in any one might be productive of serious consequences. The idea that economy will be enforced by repealing the provision will, I am confident, be found to be wholly illusory. Withdraw the power of transfer, and the Departments will increase their estimates. In some branches of the service there will be redundancies, in none will there be deficiencies. These redundancies, continuing from year to year, will be more likely to excite to profusion in those branches of the service than if they were transferred to the appropriations which were insufficient. The law, as it now stands, furnishes those whose duty it is to appropriate the money and superintend its application with all the information which is necessary to the execution of that high trust. By reducing the heads of appropriation, the labor of keeping the accounts of the Treasury, as well as of the other Departments, and in the settlement of accounts, will be greatly diminished. This reduction, however, as before stated, will not supply the place of the power of transferring from one branch of the service to another. It may be proper to observe that the power of transfer is applicable only to the War and Navy Departments.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. WILLIAM LOWNDES,
Chairman Committee of Ways and Means.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of moneys necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1817, which were ordered to lie on the table.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 4, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, for the information of the House of Representatives, an estimate of the appropriations proposed for the service of the year 1817, amounting in the whole to $12,451,799 57, viz:

For the civil list	- - -	$1,049,940 06
For miscellaneous expenses	- - -	394,241 65
For the expenses of intercourse with foreign nations	- - -	321,233 32
For the Military Establishment, including arrearages and Indian Department	- - -	7,699,625 79
For the Naval Establishment, including the marine corps	- - -	2,986,658 75
		<hr/> $12,451,799 57 <hr/>

The funds out of which the appropriations for the year 1817 may be discharged are the following:

1. The sum of $600,000, annually reserved by the act of the 4th of August, 1790, out of the duties and customs, towards the expenses of Government.
2. The proceeds of the stamp duties, and the duty on sugar refined within the United States.
3. The surplus which may remain of the customs, the direct tax, and other internal duties, after satisfying the payments for which they are pledged and appropriated.
4. Any other unappropriated money which may come into the Treasury during the year 1817.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, &c., in the military service of the United States during the late war—Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment, going to substitute a new bill, under consideration.

Mr. HARDIN first rose in support of the report of the Committee of Claims, and against the amendment. He made some animadversions, as when he spoke before, on the Commissioner and his decisions. He denied his competency, and arraigned his awards; but, if he were ever so competent, and as honest as Aristides himself, such were the facilities to fraud in the law, that, without amendment of it, as proposed by the Committee of Claims, the United States would be subject to many and great impositions. In regard to the letter of the Commissioner of this morning, Mr. H. took occasion to say he did not know under what authority the letter had been introduced into the House. The Heads of Departments, to be sure, did sometimes dictate to the House; but he never before knew that a little, petty Commissioner, (to use his own expression,) had a right to bring forward his lectures to this House how to act, and tell them what ought to be the amendments to existing laws. He did not know, indeed, that the Commissioner had any right to address Congress, unless defending himself before them on an impeachment, &c. Mr. H. then examined the three cases referred to by the Committee, and minutely analyzed them, according to his views of the evidence; and concluded, from his idea of them, and from circumstances already referred to in argument, that the large claims ought to come specially before the House. Mr. H. entered at large into the general question of national policy and duty, in regard to indemnifying its citizens for losses of private property, and objected to the wide scope which had been given, in the preceding debate on this subject, to the principle of making payment for individual property destroyed during the war; at the same time that he would not, if he could, nor would the Committee of Claims, debar just claimants under the ninth section of the act from full payment of their claims. Mr. H. again assailed the capacity of the Commissioner, of which, he said, he had shown his own consciousness in requesting of the departments an exposition of their views of the construction of the act. He then went into an examination of the proposed amendment, which he entirely disapproved, and condemned as a mere shadow. He could see no good reason why the report of the Committee of Claims should not be agreed to; and concluded by expressing his regret that the dignity of the House should have been wounded by the Speaker's imputations on its capacity, or disposition to do justice to private claimants.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR next took the floor, to sustain the bill before the House, and to oppose the amendment. In doing which he did not propose to enter into an examination of the particular awards of the Commissioner, which others had reviewed, nor to impute any censure to the Commissioner. After replying to one or two arguments which had been opposed to the bill, he came to the general position he rose to support, that the class of cases embraced by the ninth section of the law of last session, was such a one as the Legislature ought to keep to itself and, in respect thereto, to declare and execute the rule of decision. In regard to the general question as to the extent of the liability of the Government to indemnify its citizens for losses by war, he said that there was one class of cases in which the Government was bound to indemnify; another class, in which it was not so bound; and a third, of a dubious nature, the character of which varied with varying circumstances. These he defined, after going for his illustrations to the fountain of the origin, and tracing down the stream to the present state of the laws of war. The latitude which had been given to this principle in debate the other day, he did not allow; it proceeded, certainly, from a noble generosity of heart, but could not be sustained on practical grounds. The evils of war, Mr. B. showed, in the course of his argument, must operate unequally; it cannot be otherwise. Among other illustrations of this position, he cited the inequality of the contributions of personal service; the inequality of the prices obtained for produce in various parts of the country, the losses of slaves, &c.; all which inequalities, he said, it would be out of the power of the Government, if disposed, to obviate. The obligation on the United States, he laid down to be, to indemnify, as matter of right, all those losses produced by an enemy according to the rules of civilized war, and of which the Government was the direct and proximate cause of the destruction. If we pass beyond this line, we shall be at sea with neither chart nor compass to guide us; we shall lose ourselves in a labyrinth of infinite perplexity, without a clue whereby to extricate ourselves. Mr. B. next dwelt on the complexity and the importance, in principle and amount, of the cases embraced in the ninth section of the law of last session; which, therefore, he desired to repeal, and subject the cases to the decision of this House. The expediency of this course he argued at length, and replied to the various objections which had been urged against it; justifying the discrimination between the claims in the mode of adjudication, on the ground of the great difference of importance, both as to principal and amount, of the two classes of cases. Mr. B. concluded an ingenious and logical speech by a defence of the capacity of the House to decide on cases of individual claims when presented to them.

Mr. COMSTOCK supported the amendment. He considered this question one of much importance, as well to the character of the Government as to the situation of many of the unhappy sufferers in the late war, those whose property had been taken from them by the strong arm of power, which they had neither ability nor right to resist. Justice, he said, required that they should be indemnified for their losses; of which there was comparatively little prospect, if the ninth section of the law of the last session was repealed, inasmuch that most of the just claimants would, from that moment, be presumed, consider their case as hopeless. Mr. C. concluded his observations by suggesting a further amendment, proposing the appointment of an agent to examine witnesses on the part of the United States, in cases in which the President or Secretary of the Treasury shall think it necessary.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he was decidedly opposed to the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, among other reasons, because he denied that it was possible for any head of a department so to revise the execution of the act as to prevent abuses. That there had been error in the construction of the law, he said could be demonstrated; but acquitted the Commissioner of great error in this respect, since he had acted under higher authority—the President of the United States having directed the Commissioner to travel out of the act to pay for all property destroyed by the enemy, in consequence of mere military occupation, leaving the Commissioner to determine the question what constituted military occupation. Mr. F. was desirous of repealing the 9th section, to give Congress control over those cases. Mr. F. proceeded to reply to an intimation of Mr. CLAY on a former day, as understood by him, that out of seven or eight hundred cases decided by the Commissioner, three only had been selected as objectionable. This was an erroneous statement certainly, since it was known that those three only had been the subject of examination. Mr. F. said he had made it his duty, since the former debate on the subject, somewhat to examine the decisions of the Commissioner, and had examined a number of cases; and out of forty or fifty of them, he said, there were at least thirty decided, as he conceived, on grossly erroneous evidence. The papers were in possession of the House, and any one might examine in detail those cases, of which he had a memorandum in his hand. Mr. F. then proceeded to analyze several cases, commenting on the evidence, and denying its sufficiency. Some of the cases, he intimated, had been favorably decided by the Commissioner after being rejected, for deficiency of vouchers, by the Accountant of the War Department, in the settlement of a deputy quartermaster general's (Major Camp's) accounts, &c. A person who could admit claims on evidence of this description, Mr. F. said, was not to be trusted, and no revision could insure correctness to his conduct. As something like evidence of the injustice of the impression which the Speaker's remarks appeared to him calculated to produce, this exposition he considered to be due, not only to himself, but to the House, of errors, which persons who had a great deal of charity supposed to be errors of judgment. He did not, however, desire the House to impute error to the Commissioner upon his (Mr. F.'s) statements, but he asked that the facts which he had stated should be taken for true till gentlemen convinced themselves otherwise. Mr. F. concluded a speech, of which the preceding is a mere outline, by an intimation that he had intended to say something about the management of this business in and out of the House, which he should for the present reserve.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, followed Mr. FORSYTH in debate. He rose, he said, principally to say that his opinion of the Commissioner, and of his administration of the law, remained unchanged, anything the gentleman last up had said to the contrary notwithstanding; and to state that the same claims would have been passed, on the same evidence, by the very tribunal to whom the gentleman wished to refer the decision of these cases. He did not hesitate to say, from the gentleman's own showing, that he (Mr. J.) would himself have given the same decision as in these cases had been given by the Commissioner, without fear of the revisionary power of this House, much less of that power which would always control his conscience here and elsewhere. Mr. J. said he had also made it his duty to examine the conduct of the Commissioner, and he emphatically testified to his capacity, to his integrity, to his fidelity, and to his character, for honesty and intelligence. So far as the testimony of the humble individual addressing the House could go, it should rescue the character of this individual from any imputations. Mr. J. said he had nothing to do with the opinions of others, but in his opinion the construction by the Commissioner, as well of the law as of the testimony under it, would bear the test of reason as well as of patriotism, Mr. J. argued at some length on the injustice of repealing the 9th section of the law. Gentlemen might not intend it, but, whatever they might say in argument to the contrary, the principle was gone forever, and all hope of relief to the sufferers with it, if the 9th section of the law were to be repealed.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) next took the floor. He said the gentleman from Georgia had intimated that there was something he had to say, if he was provoked, respecting management of this business out of the House. As the gentleman had done him the honor to refer to him in another part of his speech, perhaps he meant also to refer to him in this remark. [Mr. FORSYTH said, in the remark he had made respecting management out of the House, he had no allusion to any member of the House.] Mr. C. intimated his satisfaction at this explanation, and went on to reply to Mr. BARBOUR, whose able and ingenious argument, he said, called for an answer. The general principle which, Mr. C. said, he had before laid down, and now meant to sustain, was, that, in regard to property within the jurisdiction of a State, if it fails in its highest obligation to protect that property, the State is bound to make indemnity to the sufferer, if, from the nature of the Government, and without too great a dilapidation of its means, it can do it without any great injury to society. He had no idea of carrying his proposition to the extremes which gentlemen had supposed, for there was no principle which, if traced too far, would not be absurd. There must be certain limitations to every rule. The qualifications to the doctrine he had advanced, which he had before mentioned, and which he now repeated, and illustrated by argument, were, that the losses should have been sustained on land, in a war of voluntary declaration, necessary or unavoidable, and not exceeding in aggregate amount the ability of the country easily to pay. Society, he argued, was a compact between those who compose it, by which they agree that contributions for the common defence shall be equal; and there ought to exist an obligation by which those losses should be equally apportioned, to which individuals were for a common object exposed.

Quitting this discussion, not necessarily connected with the question before the House, but introduced into it, and, therefore, proper to have been examined, Mr. C. adverted to the proposition to repeal the 9th section of the law of the last session, the principle of which, he maintained, was indisputably correct. It was immaterial to him, he said, whether the Commissioner was retained, or whether the decision of the claims should be left to the Department of War, &c. But he was anxious they should not be thrown back on this House, who, he said, were incompetent, not from their mental composition, but from their physical character, to decide on a mass of claims. He complained of misrepresentation of his language on this subject, in a former debate, as though he had reflected on the character or dignity of the House. He was glad to find, he said, that the dignity of the House had got into the hands of his honorable colleague from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) where he hoped it would remain untarnished. Did it detract from the dignity of this House, to say that they were not competent to Executive as well as Judicial administration? If they were, whence the principle now established as an axiom in all well regulated governments, that there should be a marked division of duties between different departments? Mr. C., after showing, from the organization of the House, the impracticability of acting on large classes of cases of private claims, adduced several instances in which, under our Government, Congress, acting on that presumption, had appointed commissioners for deciding on claims and adjusting accounts. With regard to the expression, to which gentlemen had taken so great exception, that the right of petition was a mere right to have a petition rejected, Mr. C. said it was not to be taken as universally true, for some few claims were occasionally allowed; but with regard to numberless claims, there was either a denial, or a protraction equal to a refusal of them. Not that the House was not disposed to do justice; but, from the constitution of the body, and from the multiplied duties of a public and higher nature they had to discharge, it was impossible to give due consideration to all private petitions. This position he illustrated by a reference to the report of the committee of investigation into Mr. Lee's decisions, who declined the task because of its laborious character. If a committee could not even look at the testimony in these cases, how could a body of a hundred and fifty members have passed on these claims during this session, as they might have been petitioned to do, had no commissioner been appointed?

Returning to the question on the 9th section, Mr. C. said, if a house was conflagrated in a city, the spontaneous bounty of individuals was awakened, and the distress relieved or alleviated by voluntary contributions; and, yet, in the case of a war prosecuted with so much advantage, honor, and fame to the country, the total loss of property in which did not exceed a million or a million and a half of dollars, we will not afford relief, because, according to certain speculative notions, we are not bound to do it! If the nation were in a state of poverty, the reasoning might have weight; but it was otherwise—there was a surplus in the Treasury. What invidious comparisons, he asked, would not the suffering citizen on the Niagara make between the British Government and ours, when he can pass in a canoe the narrow strait that separates us, and find an investigation of the claims for all losses, with an implied promise to indemnify the sufferers? What a parallel will he draw between even his own State, stepping forward and granting him partial relief, and the General Government refusing it! I know, said Mr. C., in conclusion of his animated speech, it has been intimated that the sufferers may come individually to Congress for redress; but what chance has the poor man who has lost his all, or without means to pay heavy expenses, to come here session after session, and at last perhaps never succeed in establishing his right? No, sir, said Mr. C., it is not inconsistent with our dignity to refer the decision of these claims to another tribunal than this House: legislate as becomes you, and then indeed you will consult the dignity of the House and the character of the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN, in reply to Mr. CLAY, said, that he had not understood the proceeding of the British Government on the Niagara frontier as an implied promise to indemnify the sufferers, but rather as an examination into the nature and extent of the loss, to be laid before the Government for its consideration—a proceeding very proper, even for this Government in similar circumstances. As to the conduct of the Emperor Alexander, to whom the Speaker had in a former debate referred, he said it was also very doubtful what was the object of his visit to the interior, whether for the purposes of munificence, as reported on the one hand, or for the administration of justice and inflicting punishment, as reported by others. Be it as it might, in either of these cases, Mr. C. said, we ought not to go abroad for examples, but to regulate our conduct by the rules of reason, where-with he could not suppose the people would be dissatisfied.

Mr. C. said, he was glad to hear the Speaker's explanation in regard to the insensibility of this House to petitions, and that he had referred to a mere physical inability to decide on these claims; an objection which could be easily obviated by raising other committees—one, for instance, for the claims from the Canadian frontier, another for those from the South, &c. He was glad to hear that the Speaker did not mean to impute to the House hardheartedness, of which construction his remarks had been susceptible. Notwithstanding the remarks since made, Mr. C. said, the position taken by him a day or two ago, and so very ably supported to-day by Mr. BARBOUR, remained unchanged; for, if he understood the qualifications of the Speaker, they denied the rule, leaving the question of remuneration to sufferers one of mere expediency. Mr. C. repeated his objection to the rule laid down by Mr. CLAY; that if established, all distinction between public and private property in war would be obliterated. As to the restraint of the laws of war, Mr. C. said, that even in the late war, the rules of civilized warfare had not been observed by our adversary to their full extent. If we were to destroy the distinction between public and private property, my word for it, said Mr. C., you would find the effect of it in any future war. Mr. C. urged the importance of adhering, in this respect, to established principles; for which reason, cases coming under the ninth section should be left to this House, that it might at once establish the rule, and decide the cases. A strict application, he said, of the rule of the law, as it exists, would not embrace many just cases, and for this reason also Congress ought to decide them, having the power to enlarge the rule. In all that had been said in favor of retaining the 9th section, a wish had been expressed, that the rule of the decision made on claims in this District, should prevail throughout the United States. Mr. C. entered his protest against it; he believed those decisions did not come within the letter of the law, within the spirit of the law, nor within the rules on which the country ought to act in this case.

Mr. BARBOUR replied to the SPEAKER. As for indemnity for losses by an enemy, in consequence of the omission of the Government to protect the property of the citizen, such cases ought to have been provided for in the Treaty of Peace at the termination of the war. But, without such provision, the Government was as much bound to indemnify for losses by private robbery, as for losses by public robbery, to which he likened the destruction of houses, &c., private property, by an enemy. An enormous debt of justice, he said, arising from the Revolutionary war, yet remained unpaid; countless millions of various losses. He did not say he would go back and remunerate those sufferers, but, if the House were to allow claims from considerations of liberality, as now urged, they certainly ought from those of justice. Mr. B. defined justice and liberality, concluding by saying that the Government ought to pay all such claims on it, as, if suable, it would be compelled in a court of law to pay. With regard to the small claims under the act of last session, he was willing to turn them over to the War Department; but in regard to cases of large amount, depending on the construction of the rule, they ought to come before the House.

At sundown, Mr. WRIGHT announced his desire to make a few remarks; and, on his motion, the Committee agreed to rise, by a small majority; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 7.

Mr. ARCHER submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to officers who, during the late war, have been promoted from the ranks of the Army, the bounty land to which they would have been entitled in case they had not been promoted.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of directing the application of the funds arising under the acts of Congress "for the relief of sick and disabled seamen," at the port of Richmond, in Virginia, in aid of the funds of the corporation of that city, towards the erection and support of a marine hospital.

On motion of Mr. GOLD, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the appointment of a judge for the northern judicial district in the State of New York, to reside in the district.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing pay and compensation to the mounted volunteers who, in the year 1813, served in the expedition to the headwaters of White River and the Wabash, under the command of Colonel Russell.

Mr. H. recapitulated the merits of the corps his resolution referred to, their services and sufferings, and the causes why their exertions were not more efficient or more brilliant.

Mr. HARRISON rose to testify to the alacrity of the corps, and the importance of the services they rendered, as well as their hardships and deserts. After which, the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. IRVING, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the propriety of amending by law that part of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," which is in the following words: "and in all cases where an ad valorem duty shall be charged, it shall be calculated on the net cost of the article at the place whence imported, (exclusive of packages, commissions, and all charges,) with the usual addition, established by law, of twenty per centum on all merchandise imported from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and ten per centum on articles imported from all other places."

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Message from the President of the United States, received yesterday, communicating the annual report of the Director of the Mint.

The bill for the relief of Henry Malcolm (ordering an allowance in his public accounts for certain money lost in the mail) was taken up, and, after a short discussion, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. ROBERTSON laid before the House sundry reports in relation to land titles in the State of Louisiana, transmitted to him by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, and of Anthony Cruzat, and L. P. Deverges," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize a new edition of the collection of laws respecting the public lands," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. YANCY having moved to go again into Committee of the Whole, on the Claims' law, and the House refusing, Mr. Y. was more successful in a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the said bill, which was agreed to.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FORSYTH called up the resolution submitted by him yesterday, to instruct the Committee on the National Currency to inquire "whether the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States have adopted any arrangement by which the payment of the specie portion of the second instalment can be evaded or postponed; and, if such arrangement has been made, the expediency of adopting some regulation by which the payment of the specie portion of the second instalment may be enforced at the time required by the act of incorporation, or within a limited time thereafter."

Mr. CALHOUN said, the House ought not to adopt this resolution, whether it regarded its own control over the bank, or justice to the institution. He denied that the facts suggested authorized the inquiry. The regulation adopted by the directors was, that loans might be had if stock to their amount was pledged for the faithful payment of the notes when due. This regulation, he contended, was a prudent one. Though by the charter dividends were withheld from those who failed to pay the second instalment, this penalty was no hold on the stockholders, because the dividends would be very small; and he was certain but little of the specie part of the second instalment would be paid in. The regulation of the bank would produce the payment of the greater part of the instalment, and was liberal as well as prudent. The bank, Mr. C. understood, commenced its operations on the first of this month; and it had been stated at the last session, in debate on the charter, that it would be obliged to give these accommodations, as their notes would be the same as specie. Mr. C. thought the regulation fair and just, because it put all subscriptions on the same footing, as all who deposited stock would be enabled to obtain a loan; but without it, a few stockholders in Philadelphia and New York, able to give security and obtain discounts, would alone have had the benefit of the aid now extended to all. It was also expedient, as without it there would have been a draft on the money market of the country of three millions of dollars, which would have produced at this time the most pernicious consequences. He repeated, that it was distinctly understood at the last session, that the second specie payment would necessarily be made by accommodations from the bank; and the House could not now say the directors had departed from the spirit or the provisions of their charter. The bank had gone into operation, and now having a will of its own, it had a right to adopt the regulation, if they perceived it was expedient. It had not been expected the specie capital would much exceed the amount of the first instalment, and the House had no reason to doubt the willingness of the bank to provide itself with an ample amount of specie, as it was notorious it had taken measures to procure it. He repeated his belief, that the resolution was unnecessary and improper.

Mr. FORSYTH was not satisfied with the reasons urged against his motion, nor were they applicable to it. He asked of the House to inquire whether the bank had postponed what was expected of it—whether it had departed from a duty required by its charter. He did not know that the arrangement alluded to had taken place; but if it had, he denied that it was within the limits of the charter, or that the directors had any authority to adopt such a regulation; because it would be receiving, instead of specie, the notes of individuals, which the act did not permit them to do. Mr. F. said, the regulation had been called liberal; his objection was that it was too liberal for the act under which the directors performed their functions; he believed it exceeded their powers, and if it was adopted in such a manner as that all parts of the country could not partake of its benefits, it was also unfair and unjust. But until inquiry was made, and the precise state of the facts known, it could not be understood. For this reason he wished the inquiry made, and hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. ROSS was in favor of the resolution, believing the regulation inexpedient as regards the public interest; because, although the bank might, by these discounts, do a good business without sending abroad a single note, the loans being made to those who would pay them in again, it would not at all promote the public interest or convenience. Mr. R. argued at some length in favor of the resolution, and to show that the regulation was improper and partial, and intended only to benefit the favorites of the bank.

Mr. CALHOUN replied to Mr. ROSS and to Mr. FORSYTH. If the resolution was not offered on a certain or even supposable state of facts, it was a good reason for rejecting the inquiry; the House ought never to proceed but upon facts at least probable; in this instance it would be an act of caprice. But admitting as true the facts suggested, they did not justify the inquiry; because, as he contended, the directors had acted consistently with their chartered rights; and he reminded Mr. FORSYTH that he had in 1815 objected to the bank bill, then discussed; that in the very nature of things, all the specie instalments would not be paid without accommodation from the bank. Mr. C. repeated his approbation of the regulation, from the impartiality it produced in the accommodations, and the unhappy effect a draft of three millions on the money market, would at this time have produced in the relation between paper and specie, which draft was obviated by the regulation.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that the information he had, was at least sufficient foundation for inquiry. True, he could not vouch for the facts, but he had sufficient reason to believe them to justify his motion. The fact suggested was that certain notes were received by the bank in lieu of the specie payment required by the charter. Whether this course was proper or expedient, it was impossible to say, without first making the necessary inquiry into the subject. That the measure adopted by the bank was unauthorized by the charter, a single glance at the act of incorporation, he thought, would prove. It was not competent, he insisted, for the bank to receive any notes whatever in lieu of the specie instalment; and if they evaded one provision of the law, they might others. He wished, also, by an inquiry, to ascertain whether the alleged regulation had been adopted in time to permit a general participation in it; he believed it was not, and therefore that it would operate unfairly.

Mr. GROSVENOR said the real question was, whether the bank had power to receive its own notes for the second instalment. The directors had shown no disposition to evade specie payments. Look at the fact, said he. They have sent to Europe to obtain a large supply of specie, and have thus taken means to insure the payment of specie. After showing their willingness to comply with the injunctions of the laws, shall we, said Mr. G., go into the bank to disturb them? The bank was now negotiating largely for specie in England, and a trivial circumstance might create alarm there and defeat the negotiation. For that reason he thought the inquiry inexpedient. The bank had manifested no symptom of evading its duty, but had shown the reverse; had evinced a desire to lay a sure foundation for specie payments. The only way the bank could have avoided the regulation, was to have closed its doors, not to have commenced business until after the second instalment was paid, otherwise the subscribers would throw their notes in and get out the specie. He thought there were no grounds for the inquiry.

Mr. WILDE declared himself in favor of the inquiry. He referred to the charter to prove that the regulation of the bank was unauthorized. If the directors could allow the specie instalment to be paid in this way, they might also permit the stock payments and all others to be evaded in the same manner. He was in favor of the inquiry, if for no other reason, to ascertain if the privilege had been extended impartially to the subscribers, and to all parts of the country.

Mr. ROBERTSON read the 9th rule of the charter, which prescribes that the corporation shall not directly or indirectly deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time, or goods which should be the proceeds of its lands; and that it shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever. Mr. R. asked whether this rule did not apply to the regulation adopted by the bank? whether the practice under that regulation was not trading in the public debt, and whether it would not violate this rule of the charter? He expected the House would often have to inquire into the conduct of the bank, and he was not unwilling to commence in this instance, where, he believed, they had proceeded improperly.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said the pledge required by the bank was not known. He had understood it was to consist of the stock of the bank; if so, Mr. ROBERTSON's objection would fail of course. He thought the mover of the resolution ought, before he brought it forward, to have been sufficiently informed to state what kind of stock was required by the bank in pledge. Mr. S. had at first been in favor of this inquiry, but subsequent reflection had changed his opinion. It might have a serious effect on the negotiations in England for specie, by producing alarm and a doubt of the inviolability of the charter, &c. He confessed he had not approved of the regulation at first, nor did he entirely now; but he did not think it any violation of the act of incorporation. The directors were very well satisfied, he believed, that a great part of the stockholders would fail to pay the instalment and forfeit their dividends, and the directors had consulted whether it would not be better for the bank to afford them accommodation, rather than that should take place. The result was nearly the same, and the two cases presented a distinction almost without a difference. He asked Mr. FORSYTH what was the difference between carrying specie to the bank to pay the instalment and paying in notes with one hand for which they might receive specie with the other? The directors, he said, had no doubt well considered the subject, and heard both sides of the question before they decided on their present course. They were bound by the charter to pay specie, and if they do that they do not violate it; if they fail in that, then it is competent for the House to interfere and inflict the penalty. He was opposed to the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. CALHOUN thought the 9th rule of the charter, quoted by Mr. ROBERTSON, had no reference to the regulation referred to, and argued that the deposit required by the bank was not that dealing or trading which was prohibited by the rule. He considered the notes of the bank the same as specie, because they were convertible into gold and silver at pleasure. Mr. C. replied to Mr. WILDE and others, and said he was the more anxious that this motion should not be agreed to, as it was a leading case of inquiry. He thought if ever the House lost its control over the bank, it would be by disturbing them on trivial questions and occasions. He had the strongest conviction that this bank, backed by the Government, would in time bring about that great revolution in our currency, so much desired; that it required all the support of the Government in it, and he hoped that the House would not now interfere in the regulations adopted with that view.

Mr. INGHAM had been at first disposed to favor the inquiry, but now thought differently; and argued at some length to show that the bank had adopted no regulation different from the ordinary course of other banks. The course adopted, and that which would have followed without it, were the same to the public interest, and did not in any way affect it. Mr. I. repeated substantially what he had reason to believe was the regulation adopted by the board of directors; it was, that it would, from the 31st of December to the 23d of January inclusive, discount on deposits of the stock of the bank at par, or of six per cent. stock of the United States at ninety per cent., provided the party putting in a note for discount and making the deposit of stock, should accompany the same with a power of attorney to sell the stock in sixty days from the first of January, (being the day the note becomes due,) and apply the money to the discharge of the note. Mr. I. thought they might have arrived at their object in another way, and that this regulation was a violation of the contract between the stockholders and the directors, by annexing a penalty to the non-payment of the notes when due; but that was a matter between themselves. As to the accommodation being extended to all parts of the country, there were but one or two offices of discount yet opened, and it could not be expected that discounts to the extent considered fair and equal, could be all effected at them.

Mr. ROBERTSON remarked, that what he had heard from the gentlemen opposed to the resolution, had resulted in a complete conviction on his mind that the regulation of the bank was unauthorized by the act; that it was clearly prohibited by the 9th rule. Mr. R. argued further to show that the regulation permitted a dealing in a manner unauthorized, and was a direct infraction of the charter. It was a dereliction which he would not countenance from a fear of any alarm held out as likely to be produced in England or elsewhere.

Mr. ROOR said they had been promised at the last session that the filthy rags with which the country was infested, would be put to flight by this gigantic institution; but it had been foretold that this bank would never have more than $1,400,000 in specie, and an amendment was made doubling the second specie instalment, that the bank might not go into operation on the first instalment alone. It seemed that the reasonable expectations of Congress had not been fulfilled, and it was asked now to inquire into it; and this inquiry must be resisted, because it might embarrass the negotiations of the bank minister in London. But he thought the inquiry would rather facilitate those negotiations, which opinion he argued to establish, and to show that if it even enhanced the price of specie in the country, that would induce its greater importation and tend to restore an equilibrium in its value. He argued also to show that but for this regulation the subscribers would not be able to evade paying the second specie instalment, and that the bank had in its adoption acted indiscreetly.

Mr. GROSVENOR replied to Mr. ROBERTSON, and maintained that the pledges required by the bank did not extend to that kind of dealing forbidden by the charter; that the stock was received as security only, and the question as to the legality of it could not properly arise until the bank undertook to sell the stock pledged.

After some further remarks from Mr. ROSS, Mr. INGHAM, and Mr. FORSYTH, in support of their respective opinions, the resolution was adopted—ayes 89, nays 68, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 8.

Mr. VOSE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Nelson, in the State of New Hampshire, praying that the mails may not be transported or opened on Sundays.

Mr. CHAMPION presented like petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of Connecticut.—Referred to the committee appointed on a similar petition, from the inhabitants of Southampton, in Massachusetts.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the United States, expressive of their satisfaction at the recommendation to Congress, by the President of the United States, of the subject of an uniformity in weights and measures, and praying that this important subject may not be suffered to languish, but that it may be carried into effect with as much expedition as its nature will admit, and as its value and merits to the people of the present and future generations require.—Referred to the Committee upon the subject of Weights and Measures.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition of the members of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the said Territory may be erected into a State and Government, and admitted into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.—Referred to the committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill for the admission of the western part of the said Territory into the Union, as a State.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency and policy of amending the act entitled, "An act relating to settlers on the lands of the United States," so that all settlers on public lands, who have not leased from the United States, shall remain thereon in peaceable possession one year, from the expiration of the existing law; and also, to inquire into the policy of extending the provisions of said act to all those who have settled down on the land lately ceded by the Chickasaws, north of Tennessee river.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to all non-commissioned officers and privates, who enlisted for and during the late war, and who served until the end thereof, or who died or were killed previously to obtaining an honorable discharge, their balance of pay and bounty in land, and who, from the causes aforesaid, and various others, did not receive regular discharges, whereby they were deemed to have forfeited said pay and bounty.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House proceeded to the order of the day, on the bill to amend the Claims' law; the question being, unless amendments were proposed, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?"

Mr. CLARK, of New York, rose and spoke at some length in favor of a motion he made to strike out the word ninth from among the sections of the law proposed to be repealed. He depicted the sufferings which he himself had witnessed of the people on the Niagara frontier, who would be particularly injured by the repeal of the provision in their favor, and the consequent disappointment of just expectations founded on the act of the last session.

Mr. DESHA suggested the expediency of adding to this motion the tenth section, as being connected with the ninth.

Mr. YANCEY opposed the motion, that had for its object to prevent the repeal of the ninth section. The principle of that section, he admitted, was a just one; but it had received a construction which Congress never intended; for it was not their intention to provide for the payment of all claims for losses during the war, which should be even just, but to provide for a limited class of cases. He was of opinion that the cases coming under this section should come before the House; though he should not consider it very important to take that course, if the House should prefer to transfer the adjudication of these claims also to the Accountant of the War Department, upon the uniform correctness of whose decisions, heretofore, he relied for a correct construction of the law in future. Mr. YANCEY appeared anxious that the partiality of the Committee of Claims to this bill, should not be considered as proceeding from hostility to the principle of the ninth section, but from a wish that the claims should be correctly adjudicated.

Mr. WRIGHT next rose. He entered at large into the question of general law, so far as it regards the obligation on a Government to indemnify its citizens for losses sustained during war. He advocated in this respect what had been called in debate too liberal a policy; he sustained it by arguments drawn from the theory of the law, as well as by reference to the practice of this Government, even as early as the Revolution, up to this day. The Government, he concluded, had always recognised its duty to protect the citizen, and remunerate him for his losses from the hand of an enemy, sometimes even maritime losses. Adverting then to the question before the House, he opposed the repeal of the principle incorporated in the law of the last session, which provides for the payment for houses destroyed on account of their military occupation; and multiplied argument on argument to show that justice and policy, putting liberality out of the question, combined to sustain the law. He defended the decisions of the Commissioner under the act, and said that he did not believe any man who had taken the trouble to examine them, could think otherwise than he did on that head. He dwelt on the right of those who had suffered in the war, in consequence of the failure of the Government to protect them, to demand remuneration, from which they ought not certainly to be debarred, because of the amount of their claims, which had been opposed as an objection, very unjustly and parsimoniously, to a liberal execution of the law.

Mr. ROBERTSON, adverting to the mass of business before the Committee of Public Lands, and inferring thence the quantity before other committees, insisted on the opinion he formerly expressed of the inadequacy of the House to a proper examination and decision of the claims embraced in the ninth section. He opposed the proposition to repeal that section, as an attempt to take away a vested right, to put afloat principles solemnly established by law. In the course of his argument, Mr. R. contended, that in justice, (not in liberality merely,) the Government was bound to pay, first, for that property which the United States have themselves used or destroyed in war; second, for all property destroyed by the enemy, because having been useful or necessary to the Army of the United States; and, still further, he would provide for the payment for property destroyed by us because in the possession or use of the enemy. Mr. R. dwelt on the importance of this principle to the State which he represented, through which, in any future war, the enemy will seek access to the back country. It was not, therefore, in regard to present losses that he was anxious so much as to establish the rule now, that in any future war the people may have some encouragement to make that defence against invasion which they had so gloriously made during the late war. Mr. R. referred to history for numerous examples even of despots remunerating and solacing their subjects in war, and much more, he said, ought a Government depending on the attachment of its people, and leagued by common interests in one society, to pursue that policy.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, suggested a modification of the amendment which he had offered in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the whole of this bill excepting the enacting clause, and substitute therefor a revisionary power in one of the Heads of Departments. Mr. J. then proceeded to an examination of the cases referred to by Mr. FORSYTH as incorrectly decided by the Commissioner, and affirmed that the same decisions he should himself have made, had the cases been placed before him for decision, and so he was convinced would a large majority of the House, after the representation which he should make of the cases. He then examined the evidence, as connected with the law of the last session, and thoroughly justified the decisions referred to by Mr. FORSYTH. Facts, he said, were stubborn things, and ought to influence the House in its decisions more than general clamor; and facts he had presented to the House to vindicate the Commissioner from what he considered unjust imputations on his capacity or character. If he had decided the cases otherwise, Mr. J. said he would have voted to dismiss that Commissioner. Mr. J. disclaimed any the least intention disrespectful to Mr. FORSYTH, but expressed his astonishment at the view Mr. F. had taken of this subject, which was as wide from that of Mr. J. as the poles are asunder. After concluding his examination of these cases, he appealed to the sensibility of the House to repel the argument against paying these claims on account of the amount of perhaps one million of dollars. It was too late, he said, after patriotic blood had freely flowed, after private property had been laid waste, after an hundred and ten millions of dollars had been expended in the war—it was too late to spurn the petitions, the just rights of the sufferers in the war by the agency of the Government, because, forsooth, they amount to a million of dollars! He appealed to the good sense of the House not to pursue a course which would steel the hearts of the people and of their posterity, in any future war, to the calls upon them by the Government for sacrifices. He beseeched gentlemen not, like the miser, to cling to the strong box, the closer the richer they grew, but rather lend their aid to dry the tears of the widow, and heal the wounds of the broken-hearted.

Mr. FORSYTH rejoined to Mr. JOHNSON's remarks on particular cases, prefacing his remarks by the assurance of the sincerity with which he reciprocated the sentiments of respect and good will which the gentleman had expressed. He re-examined the cases he had before referred to, and declared, so far did he differ from Mr. JOHNSON, that for those decisions alone would he have dismissed the Commissioner. After going through a critical examination of the cases referred to, Mr. F. concluded, by a general objection to all the cases of impressment, decided by the Commissioner, that there was no evidence of the necessity of impressment of property in any case; and no such individual property destroyed ought to be paid for, he said, without evidence to that effect.

Mr. WILDE made a number of remarks in regard to evidence, corresponding with those of Mr. FORSYTH, being, like him, disposed wholly to condemn the decisions of the Commissioner. Mr. W. was in favor of the bill reported by the Committee of Claims, so as to bring the cases specially before this House, whose capacity to decide them he maintained. He also took other views of the subject, which, owing to his position, the reporter could not distinctly hear.

Mr. GROSVENOR next spoke, on the opposite side of the question. He put the conduct of the Commissioner out of the question, although he said that, by passing this act, Congress would effectually legislate the Commissioner out of office, and would, in this mode, indirectly exercise a function which the Constitution had expressly refused to them, and given to another authority. Mr. G. then turned his attention to the question regarding the act; replied to Mr. WILDE; and, in his usual spirited manner, analyzed the arguments in favor of this bill, and replied to them, contending that this House was wholly unfit to adjudicate such a mass of cases as those embraced in the ninth section. The laws of evidence were also brought into discussion by Mr. G.; in regard to which, he wholly differed from the gentleman from Georgia, who had spoken on the subject.

Mr. YANCEY rose in defence of the Committee of Claims against the imputations on the principles laid down by that committee, and on their general conduct. He denied the correctness of the intimation that the Commissioner of Claims had not had fair play in the House, so far as it applied to the Committee of Claims: so far, he pointedly averred, the remark was wholly unfounded.

Mr. HULBERT explained the reasons why he was opposed to repealing the ninth section of the act of last session; especially, since the cases would come before the Additional Accountant of the War Department, of whom, personally, Mr. H. spoke with high praise. He also gave great applause to the President for his conduct in taking upon himself the responsibility of suspending the decisions of the Commissioner, and he had no doubt, in so doing, that the President had acted strictly within his legal duty. He never would, he said, among other remarks, give a vote which would retain in office the present Commissioner, who, though he believed he was a truly honorable man, possessed too much feeling to act as a Commissioner under that law.

Mr. COMSTOCK replied to some of the objections made to the ninth section, particularly to that founded on the act's prescribing rules, of which claimants were enabled to take advantage to procure evidence in support of claims. He also replied fully to Mr. FORSYTH's objection to Mr. LEE's decisions, that he had required no evidence of the necessity of impressment in cases of impressed property destroyed. It was the act of the officer, presumed to act correctly, by which the individual suffered, and not the necessity for that act.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLARK's motion to strike out of the bill the word "ninth,"

So the House decided against repealing the ninth section of the law of last session.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the whole of the said bill after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof, to insert as follows:

"That in all cases arising under the ninth section of an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' the decision of the Commissioner shall be revised and sanctioned, or rejected by the Secretary of the Treasury. And that, in all cases arising under the remaining sections of the said act, the decisions of the Commissioner shall be revised and sanctioned, or rejected, by the Secretary of War; without which sanction, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States, to satisfy any such claim; and, at the next session of Congress, the said Secretaries shall make report of such cases as may be embraced by said act, but which, in their opinion, should be provided for by law; and in all cases where the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, or the President of the United States, shall deem it expedient, an agent shall be appointed to examine the witnesses that may be called upon by any claimant, and the agent shall moreover have the power to call for witnesses on the part of the United States."

Mr. YANCEY spoke briefly against the amendment; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 9.

Another member, to wit: from New York. JOHN B. YATES, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. CLENDENNIN, suggesting that, through mistake on yesterday, he had voted in the negative, upon the question then depending, so to amend the first section of the bill, to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes, as to strike out that part of the same, which goes to a repeal of the "ninth" section of the said act, and moved that he have leave to correct the said mistake, by placing his vote in the affirmative on that question.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of the religious society of Friends, in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and the Eastern Shore of Maryland, praying that other and stronger provisions may be enacted to prevent the traffic in negro slaves, from one State to another within the United States, in which traffic they allege that many persons of color, free, or entitled to freedom at a given time, are carried into perpetual slavery.—Referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the African slave trade.

Mr. PLEASANTS presented a petition, signed by Edward Cutbush and Samuel R. Marshall, on behalf of the surgeons and surgeons' mates of the Navy of the United States, praying that a determinate rank may be affixed to their situation in the Navy; that their pay and emoluments may be increased, and that further provision may be made for those who, having been many years afloat, may be appointed to the charge of naval hospitals.—Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PICKENS presented a petition of a Convention of Delegates from fifteen counties of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the said Territory may not be divided, but that the same may be admitted into the Union with its present limits, as a State, on an equal footing with the original States; which was ordered to be referred to a select committee; and Messrs. PICKENS, HALL, HENDERSON, SHARPE, CREIGHTON, YATES, and CHAMPION, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that such persons as have settled on the public lands lately conquered from the Indians may be permitted to remain thereon until the same shall be exposed to public sale.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SCOTT presented a resolution of the Legislature of the said Territory, soliciting that a road may be opened by the United States, from the town of St. Louis, to the northern boundary of the State of Louisiana, by the post of Arkansas.—Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report respecting the subsistence of the Army; which, being read, Mr. L. reported a bill making a partial appropriation for the subsistence of the Army during the year 1817, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Payment for Lost Property.

JANUARY, 1817.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill making provision for the location of the lands reserved by the first article of the Treaty of the 9th of August, 1814, between the United States and the Creek nation, to certain chiefs and warriors of that nation, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Treasury Department enclosing a report and statement of loan office and final settlement certificates issued under the authority of the Continental Congress, which remain outstanding, made in obedience to a resolution of the 15th of April last; which were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS WILSON, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were directed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provision by law is requisite to enable riding masters of the Revolutionary war to receive a bounty in land equal to that allowed to other officers of the same rank.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for holding annually two terms of the circuit court of the United States, within the District of Maine, in Massachusetts.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Malcolm," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "to authorize a new edition of the collection of laws respecting the public lands," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles: An act to increase the salaries of the register and receiver of public moneys of the land office at Marietta; An act making a further appropriation for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, and for other purposes; and an act requiring the Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish an office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia; in which bills they request the concurrence of this House.

MISSISSIPPI LANDS.

Mr. CANNON called up the resolution submitted by him to inquire into the expediency of laying off a separate surveyor's district in the Mississippi Territory, adjoining the southern boundary of Tennessee, and including the late purchases made from the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians, and to provide for the appointment of a principal surveyor for said district; also, a register and receiver of public moneys; and to make such further provision as may be necessary to have the lands within the same, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, surveyed, and offered for sale as soon as practicable.

After a few explanatory remarks from Mr. CANNON, the resolution was agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House again took up this subject—Mr. JOHNSON's substitute for the bill reported by the Committee of Claims being still under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON rose in support of the substitute, though he had not been entirely friendly to all the provisions of the act of last session, and showing that the construction given to the 9th section by the Executive would not embrace a single case on the Northwestern frontier. Mr. H. read an amendment which he deemed necessary to give just scope to the law, and entered into a particular and minute argument to establish the expediency and justice of relief to the cases which his proposition embraced. Without expressing an opinion on the merits of the Commissioner, he was opposed to legislating him out of office without a fair investigation into his conduct, and said that officer would have reason to complain if the inquiry into his conduct was not prosecuted to some end, &c. The amendment which Mr. H. wished to engraft on Mr. JOHNSON's substitute, was, substantially, first, that the act should be construed to extend to every house which was destroyed by the order of any officer in the service of the United States to facilitate the operations of the army, or any detachment thereof, or to impede those of the enemy. Second. That the 9th section of the act should be construed to extend to every house, whether occupied as a military deposite, or as barracks for soldiers, or as a hospital, which, during the late war, was destroyed by the enemy in consequence of such occupation; and to all houses destroyed by the enemy in consequence of a military resistance from or in the neighborhood of the same, provided no house should be so included, unless it had been hired under the authority of the Government, or was at the time actually used for the purposes mentioned.

Mr. FLETCHER advocated the amendment, and stated some cases of hardship which would be relieved by it, but which it was not probable from the nature of things as they existed, the mass of business before the committees, and the difficulty of establishing individual claims before the House, would ever receive relief from the House if the law were repealed. Mr. F. argued at some length in support, as well of the substitute as of the amendment proposed thereto.

Mr. HARDIN rose in reply in opposition to the substitute, and in support of the report of the Committee of Claims; and, without expressing any opinion at present on Mr. HARRISON's amendment in the abstract, he was decidedly opposed to it, because it contemplated and concurred in retaining the Commissioner, whose conduct and ability he remarked on with strong disapprobation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in a few words, suggested to Mr. HARRISON the propriety of withdrawing his amendment at present; which

Mr. HARRISON coincided in, and accordingly withdrew his proposition.

Mr. YANCEY argued at large in favor of the repeal proposed by the Committee of Claims, and the propriety of giving the direction by them, proposed to the kind of claims recommended to be taken from the adjudication of the Commissioner. He maintained the capacity of the House to decide, and the promptitude of the Committee of Claims in acting on claims which have been presented, &c., and opposed the substitute as well as the amendment submitted by Mr. HARRISON, because cases of the kind embraced by the latter had already been comprehended by the construction of the Commissioner, and acted on by him, &c.

Mr. REYNOLDS expressed his regret at being obliged to oppose the substitute and to vote for the course reported by the Committee of Claims; but, though friendly to the law of last session, he could not see thousands of the public money squandered on the claims now provided for, when there were so many cases of suffering of the Revolutionary war unrelieved, and which had been rejected by this House; and because a class of cases included in the decisions of the Commissioner belonged to Congress to decide on, and which could not properly be transferred to any other tribunal, &c.

The question on agreeing to Mr. JOHNSON'S substitute was then decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Atherton, Avery, Bassett, Betts, Breckenridge, Cannon, Comstock, Creighton, Desha, Fletcher, Gaston, Gold, Glasgow, Harrison, Herbert, Huger, Hungerford, Irving of New York, Jewett, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, Lewis, Lovett, Lyon, McKee, Mills, Hugh Nelson, Ormsby, Peter, Robertson, Sharpe, Sheffield, Stuart, Tate, Taul, Taylor of New York, Wilkin, Thos. Wilson, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Archer, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Birdseye, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Brooks, Burwell, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Condict, Crawford, Crocheron, Culpeper, Davenport, Dickens, Edwards, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Hahn, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Hendricks, Hooks, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Ingham, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, King, Langdon, Little, Love, Lyle, Wm. Maclay, Wm. P. Maclay, Marsh, Mason, McCoy, McLean, Miller, Milnor, Moore, Murfree, J. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, Noyes, Pickens, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Powell, Reynolds, Rice, Roane, Root, Ross, Rugles, Savage, Schenck, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Telfair, Thomas, Townsend, Tyler, Vose, Wallace, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilde, Williams, Wm. Wilson, Woodward, and Yancey.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. HARDIN never having thought that the 9th section of the law had, strictly construed, extended far enough, and wishing to give it a little more latitude, stated that he should hereafter submit an amendment to accommodate the law to the view he had mentioned.

Mr. WRIGHT, after some prefatory remarks approbatory of the present Commissioner and deprecating the intent to legislate him out of office, proposed an amendment, substantially, to authorize the President of the United States to appoint two additional commissioners to act conjointly with the present officer, in deciding the claims provided for in the act—instead of referring that duty to the Accountant of the War Department, &c., as proposed by the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was in favor of the amendment, on the ground that the bill contemplated referred to the war accountants a mass of business which they cannot possibly attend to in addition to their present duties, and the preference of erecting the tribunal proposed by Mr. WRIGHT, which would be able to decide better and with greater despatch the cases referred to them.

Mr. YANCEY replied to Mr. SMITH respecting the ability of the war accountants to perform the proposed additional duties, which he maintained they were able to do, and that it was more safe to adopt that mode.

Mr. WRIGHT supported his amendment, and referred to former experience in the Government to prove the superiority of his plan for the administration of the act; that the Executive Departments were already so overburdened with business that a new department had been recommended, and bills were already reported by the Senate to lessen the duties of those departments—and consequently the impropriety of referring to them business of the important character now under consideration.

Mr. PICKERING thought there was already business enough to occupy the war accountant, and opposed the committing to that person, though a very competent man, the duties of a judge, to decide cases amounting perhaps to a million and a half of dollars, and he would therefore prefer a commission of three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, without saying anything about the present Commissioner; and moved to amend the amendment so as to suit his views.

Mr. DESHA, after stating his belief that it would be impossible to carry the amendment offered by Mr. WRIGHT, as he was convinced there was a combination to legislate the Commissioner out of office, stated that he should offer an amendment to repeal those sections of the law under which the Commissioner was appointed, etc., and in lieu thereof to authorize the appointment of three new commissioners.

Mr. PICKERING withdrew his motion; and

Mr. WRIGHT'S motion was lost without a division.

A motion was then made by Mr. DESHA, to strike out all of the said bill after the enacting clause, and to insert as follows:

That the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th sections of the act, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for the property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed on the 9th day of April, 1816, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for carrying into execution the above-recited act, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to decide upon all cases arising under the before-recited act; and who, in the discharge of their duties, shall be subject to the rules and regulations that have been, or may be prescribed by the President of the United States. The commissioners so appointed shall receive, as compensation for their services, at the rate of — per annum each for the time they shall be actually employed, which shall not exceed eighteen months, to be computed from and after the passage of this act: all official communications to and from the commissioners appointed under this act, shall be free of postage.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, so to be appointed, before they enter upon the duties of their offices, shall each take the following oath, to wit: "I, A. B. do solemnly swear, that I will, well and truly, according to the best of my abilities, discharge the duties of Commissioner under an act of Congress, entitled 'An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes;' so help me God:" upon which they shall proceed to appoint a clerk; and shall proceed to the execution of the above-recited act, under the rules already prescribed by the President of the United States, for the adjustment of claims to compensation for the corps provided for by the said act, or to establish such further rules as may be deemed necessary for the due execution of the law, under the direction, or by the consent of the President of the United States, having due regard, in the establishment of further regulations, as well to the claims of individual justice, as to the interest of the United States, and if it should be found necessary to establish any other rules or regulations for the due execution of the act, the said commissioners shall cause them to be published for four weeks, successively, in the newspapers in the several States, and Territories in which the laws of the United States are published.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall, in all cases in which the claim to compensation or indemnity shall exceed the sum of two hundred dollars, award a commission to some one or more discreet commissioner, in the vicinity of where the witnesses are stated to reside, accompanied by interrogatories to be propounded to such witnesses, which said commission, when executed, shall be returned, together with the examination to be taken in virtue thereof, by mail, free of postage, to the office of the commissioners.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in all adjudications of the said commissioners upon the claims mentioned in the said recited act, whether such judgment be in favor of, or adverse to the claim of the applicant, the same shall be entered by the clerk in a book to be provided for that purpose; and when such judgment shall be in favor of such claim, shall entitle the claimant, or his legal representative, upon the production of a copy of such judgment, duly certified by the clerk of said commissioners, to payment of the amount thereof, at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DESHA supported the expediency of his amendment as well as the justice of relieving liberally sufferings sustained in the late war, and the impracticability of having the claims, from the pressure of business, properly attended to by the officers of the War Department, arguing that the effect of such a course would be tantamount to a denial of justice.

The amendment was supported warmly by Messrs. ROBERTSON, HARRISON, FLETCHER, PICKERING, and SHEFFEY, on the ground of inability of the accountants of the War Office to perform the additional duties enjoined by the act, when they were already so pressed by business as to require a new organization of the Department; and the superior correctness of those whose special business it would be; and also by the last named gentleman, from an objection to legislate a person out of office, and because, of two courses, neither of which he liked, he disliked the amendment least.

It was opposed by Messrs. YANCEY and HARDIN, from a belief that the Departments were competent to execute the law, and that the mode was preferable for other reasons to the one proposed, which they argued to prove.

Messrs. HULBERT and ALEXANDER, without taking sides on the amendment, respectively made some remarks on the manner of doing business in the War Department and the despatch with which public business was transacted there.

Mr. ROOT supported the amendment at some length, and proposed to include in the sections proposed to be stricken out, the 10th section of the act, the vague and improper wording of which had led to misconstruction and error. His motion was lost without a division.

Mr. DESHA's amendment was negatived—yeas 69, nays 75.

A motion was made by Mr. TAUL, to insert, at the end of the third section, the following:

"Provided, however, That in all cases of claims against the United States, arising under the first and second sections of the act to which this is an amendment, the muster rolls, made out by the proper officer, shall be taken and received as sufficient evidence of the value and loss of the property, for which compensation is claimed, where such muster rolls exhibit evidence of those facts."

The motion was opposed by Mr. YANCEY, and supported by Mr. FLETCHER, and was lost without a division.

A motion was then made, by Mr. HARRISON, to amend the bill by inserting the following sections, to come in after the first section, to wit:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the fifth section of said recited act shall be construed to extend to every house or building, which in the late war shall have been destroyed by the order of any officer in the service of the United States, with a view to facilitate the operations of the American Army, or any detachment thereof, or to impede those of the enemy.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the ninth section of the said act shall hereafter be construed to extend to every house or building, whether occupied as a military deposite, or as barracks for soldiers, or as an hospital, which during the late war shall have been destroyed by the enemy in consequence of such occupation, and to all houses or buildings destroyed by the enemy, in consequence of a military resistance from, or in the neighborhood of the same. Provided always, That no house or building shall be construed a military deposite, within the meaning of this section, or of the act aforesaid, unless it had been hired under the authority of the Government, or which at the time it was destroyed was actually used for that purpose; and provided also, that no house or building shall be considered a barrack within the meaning of this section, on account of its having been in the temporary occupancy of the troops of the United States upon a march, unless in the immediate presence of the enemy.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to postpone until to-morrow the further consideration of the bill and amendment, for the purpose of having the latter printed. And the question being taken thereon, it was also determined in the negative.

The question was then taken to agree to that part of the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON, comprised within the first section thereof, marked section two in the amendment; and was determined in the negative.

The question was taken on the second section of the amendment marked section three; and also determined in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAM P. MACLAY moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word "produce," in the fifth line of the third section, the following words: "Provided that no evidence shall be received other than that of citizens or inhabitants of the United States."

After some discussion, in which Mr. YANCEY opposed, and the mover supported the amendment, it was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. ROSS moved a verbal amendment in the clause defining the evidence to be required, with the view of making the provision more clear and definite.

The motion was opposed by Mr. YANCEY, Mr. SHEFFEY, and Mr. WARD of Massachusetts, and advocated by Messrs. ROSS, ROOT, and DESHA, and finally negatived by a large majority.

Mr. CANNON moved an amendment, requiring the Commissioner to give certificates of his awards to the claimants in all cases adjudicated by him previous to the suspension of the operation of the ninth section of the law.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. YANCEY, FORSYTH, HARDIN, and JOHNSON of Kentucky, and supported by Messrs. CANNON and TADOL, and was disagreed to by a large majority.

Mr. INGHAM then, after some introductory remarks, in which he argued against the immense extent of claims which the construction of the ninth section of the act had embraced, further, he believed, than was contemplated, and on which it was essential the House should express some definite opinion, and adopt some special provision for the government of the future construction, moved to amend the bill by inserting a new section, declaring that the ninth section should not be construed to extend to houses or other buildings occupied by the military forces of the United States, except the same shall have been occupied by the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, as a place of deposite for munitions of war.

Before the question was taken on the amendment, a motion was made (several similar motions having been negatived) to adjourn; and the House adjourned at sunset.

FRIDAY, January 10.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of the Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, praying for aid of the National Government, in carrying into effect the objects of their association.—Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of the representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, and of Anthony Cruzat, and P. L. Deverges," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the widow and minor children of Abraham Owen, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from Jonathan Jennings, President of the late Convention of the people of Indiana, enclosing a copy of the constitution, as adopted for the government of the State, which were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate "to increase the salaries of the register and receiver of public moneys, of the land office at Marietta," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate "making a further appropriation for the purchase of books, for the Library of Congress, and for other purposes," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "requiring the Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish an office of discount and deposite in the District of Columbia," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate entitled, "An act to authorize a new edition of laws respecting the public lands," was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House an authenticated copy of the constitution of the State of Indiana, which had been officially transmitted to him.

Mr. CANNON laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to reduce the Army of the United States.

On motion of Mr. TELFAIR, a select committee were instructed to inquire at large into the claims of detachments of the militia of Georgia ordered out by the Governor during the years 1793 and 1794, for the defence of its frontiers, in consequence of a discretionary power communicated by the War Department.

Military Bounty Lands—Missouri Contested Election.

JANUARY, 1817.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing such part of the library as is composed of law books, to some room convenient to Congress. [The library being at present in the building formerly occupied by Congress, some distance from the present hall.]

Some debate ensuing, the resolution, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, was laid on the table.

Mr. ROOT, after a few explanatory observations, moved a resolution, that the law of 1798, authorizing certain officers of the Government to administer oaths, ought to be so amended as to authorize the chairman of a standing committee of this House also to administer oaths, and that the Judiciary Committee bring in a bill accordingly; which was agreed to.

Mr. PICKENS made an unsuccessful motion to call up his resolution to amend the Constitution.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed by a resolution of the seventh instant, to inquire into the expediency of appointing a judge for the northern district of the State of New York, made an unfavorable report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were also instructed by a resolution of the 19th ultimo, to inquire into the propriety of so amending or explaining the fourth section of the act of the 6th of May, 1812, for designating, surveying, and granting military bounty lands, as to authorize a devise of said bounty land, though no patent shall have been granted therefor at the time of the devise, made a report, recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to alter or change the existing law in this respect in anywise whatever.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to amend the report, by reversing its recommendation, so as to declare it expedient to amend the law on the subject; and entered into an argument to show the propriety of allowing a devise of military bounty lands, which, he contended, the soldier had as good a right to do as if he had acquired the land with his money, instead of his blood and public services—that at present a soldier could not even devise his bounty land to his wife, because a possible abuse might ensue from giving him the right of willing away the reward bestowed on him by his country, &c.

Mr. NELSON rose to support the report, and argued that the committee had discovered no reason to change the provisions of the law—that it was a contract between the country and the soldier—that, to keep the soldier out of the hands of the crafty speculator, it was expedient to preserve the law as at present—that, in examining the subject, the committee found additional reason to retain the restriction which prevented the soldier from the disposal of his bounty land, &c. That if the barrier was once broken down, there was no saying where the evil would stop; and that they might hereafter see the soldier and his family stripped of their property, if exposed to the arts of the unprincipled and designing.

Mr. HARDIN remarked on the necessity which had permitted soldiers to declare their last will by word of mouth, from the difficulty of making written ones, and that, to prevent frauds practised under this privilege, it was proper to forbid the power of devising their bounty land, &c. That there were many who would fight well, and make good soldiers, yet be so lost to moral honesty as to bear false witness to the dying words of a soldier, and, as had been done, fraudulently deprive a soldier's family of his property.

Mr. BARBOUR made some further remarks, in which he cited instances of hardship to prove the propriety of his amendment, and to show that the evils apprehended to the soldier from allowing a devise, might be obviated by proper provisions in the law.

Mr. PICKERING spoke on the improbability of any speculation from allowing a soldier to devise his land, and on the propriety of permitting such a disposal.

Mr. WILDE also made some remarks, suggesting that the evils stated by Mr. BARBOUR, arose from the laws of Virginia, and might, by the Legislature thereof, be so amended as to remove the particular hardships mentioned.

The report was then reversed, according to Mr. BARBOUR's motion, and the Judiciary Committee instructed to report a bill accordingly.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Elections, to which was recommended their report of the 31st December last, with certain instructions, made an additional report, which was committed to a Committee of the whole House, to-morrow. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to which was recommended their report of the 31st of December last, with instructions "to receive evidence that persons voting for either candidate were not entitled to vote in the said election," report the same to the House, with the following additional facts and statements:

The general notice served by the petitioner on the sitting Delegate, on the 24th of September last, is in the following words: "Sir, take notice that I shall take the depositions of witnesses before some proper authority, to be read in the House of Representatives of the United States at the next session of Congress, for the purpose of establishing my right to a seat in that body, as a Delegate from the Territory of Missouri."

On the next day, the petitioner served on the sitting Delegate a special notice of taking testimony in the townships of St. Charles and Cote Sans Dessein, in the county of St. Charles, and in the township of Bon Homme, in the county of St. Louis, for the purpose of proving that the judges of the election in the latter township "improperly refused to count a number of legal votes given for him;" and in the other townships "for the purpose of proving that no legal election was held; that a sufficient number of judges did not attend, that the judges were not sworn; that no clerks were appointed; that no poll-book was kept; and that no votes were legally taken." It was upon the evidence taken in pursuance of this special notice, that the committee rejected the votes from the township of Cote Sans Dessein. On the 28th of September last, the sitting Delegate served on the petitioner a general notice in the same form with that first received by him from the petitioner, concluding in the following words :

"Which depositions, at each of those places and days, will be taken for the purpose of proving that the election, in each of the townships, for a Delegate to the Congress of the United States from the Territory of Missouri, was not held on the first Monday of August last past, according to law, in the following particulars, to wit : That a place in each township had not been named for holding such election agreeably to law ; that the elections were not held at the places appointed for holding the same in each of the townships ; that no notice of such election, and of the times and places of holding the same, had been given by the respective sheriffs ; that the polls were not opened according to law in the several townships ; that no judges of election had been appointed by the circuit courts ; that no judges of election were chosen by the people, and none officiated or were sworn according to law ; that no clerks were appointed nor sworn ; no poll-books kept, and no legal votes given to you ; that illegal votes were given for you as Delegate, and legal votes given for me as Delegate, rejected by the judges ; that the oaths of the judges and clerks are not prefixed to the poll-books ; that the poll-books have not been signed by the judges and clerks ; that the returns have not been made of votes legally taken for me, and improper votes have been admitted, and the votes counted for you ; that the polls have not been opened and the votes counted by the clerks and two justices ; and that the voters have not been permitted to give in their votes freely, and many who wished to vote for me, have been, by threats and violence, prevented from so doing."

No notice was given by either party of the names of the electors objected against for want of qualifications ; nor was either party notified by the other that the particular qualifications of the electors would be investigated, nor were the names of the magistrates stated before whom depositions were to be taken.

The sitting Delegate contends that he considered himself authorized, under his general notice, to examine witnesses to every point of objections which he might find himself able to support in the course of investigation. And the petitioner alleged that he did not suppose an investigation into the qualifications of the electors and the persons for whom they voted, to be admissible ; that the only case in which that inquiry had been made in his behalf, related to the votes in the township of Cote Sans Dessein, which was done without his instruction or consent.

In the case of Joseph B. Varnum, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, whose election was contested at the first session of the fourth Congress, the Committee of Elections, (we adopt the words of their report,) "as well from the difficulty of the case, as from a desire to have uniformity in proceedings of this kind, were induced to pray the instructions of the House as to the kind of specification that shall be demanded of the petitioner, and the manner in which the evidence shall be taken."

Upon this application, after several days' debate in the Committee of the Whole, the House resolved, "That the names of the persons objected to, for want of sufficient qualifications, ought to be set forth prior to the taking of the testimony."

The rule prescribed in this resolution was adopted by the committee, in the case of McCoy and Porterfield, at the last session of Congress, and, as far as your committee are advised, has been uniformly adhered to ; it is important, not only to the parties, but to this House, that it should be preserved. The committee were, therefore, of opinion that the evidence taken in pursuance of the beforementioned general notices, ought not to be received.

If the House concur with the committee in this opinion, it follows that no evidence has been submitted by either party, enabling the committee to investigate the qualifications of the electors.

The committee are further of opinion that evidence cannot be procured in season to enable the committee to investigate the qualifications of the electors during the present Congress. From Howard county on the north, to Arkansas on the south, as the roads run, is about eight hundred miles ; the settlements extend west of the Mississippi from fifty to one hundred and seventy miles ; the Territory is divided into nine counties and about fifty townships.

In addition to the difficulties arising from the extent of territory, the law of Missouri prescribes no mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for Delegate to Congress ; nor is there any territorial authority to compel the attendance of witnesses for that purpose. The great distance of the Territory from this place, renders it impracticable, even if the power should be granted to send for the persons whose evidence is considered essential for the purpose of examination before the committee : the committee, therefore, respectfully submit to the House the following resolution :

"Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be discharged from further investigation into the qualifications of the said electors."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on the National Currency, to whom was referred a resolution, directing them to inquire whether the Directors of the United States Bank have adopted any arrangements by which the specie portion of the second instalment can be evaded or postponed, made a report, as follows :

The Committee on the National Currency, to whom was referred the resolution of the House, directing them to inquire "whether the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States have adopted any arrangement by which the specie portion of the second instalment can be evaded or postponed, and, if such arrangement has been made, the expediency of adopting some regulation by which the payment of the specie portion of the second instalment may be enforced at the time required by the act of incorporation, or within a limited time thereafter"—

Report, that they have availed themselves of the opportunity of obtaining the information required by the House, through the honorable James Lloyd, one of the directors of the National Bank, now in this city. In answer to their inquiries the committee received from him the letter which accompanies this report ; and, on mature examination of the facts disclosed by it, they are of the opinion that the bank, in adopting the arrangement, were actuated by a sincere desire to effect the great objects for which it was instituted, as well as a regard to its own immediate interest. The committee are unanimously of opinion, that it would be inexpedient to adopt any regulation ; and therefore report the following resolution :

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1817.

Resolved, That the Committee on the National Currency be discharged from further proceeding on the above recited resolution.

COMMITTEE ROOM, Jan. 9, 1817.

DEAR SIR: The Committee on the National Currency have, by the vote of the House, been directed to inquire, "whether the president and directors of the Bank of the United States have adopted any arrangement by which the specie part of the second instalment can be evaded, or postponed;" and I have been directed by the committee to request you, as one of the directors of that institution, to inform them whether any such arrangement has been adopted; and, if any, of what character. Should there be any such arrangement, the committee would be gratified in knowing the object and reasons of the bank in adopting it; and, in making this request, they wish it to be distinctly understood, that they do not consider it any part of their duty to inquire into the expediency of the arrangement, provided it be within the limits of the chartered powers of the bank.

With sentiments of esteem, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

HON. JAMES LLOYD.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note from you of this date, as chairman of the Committee on the National Currency, informing me that the committee have, by a vote of the House of Representatives of the United States, been instructed to inquire "whether the president and directors of the Bank of the United States have adopted any arrangement by which the specie part of the second instalment can be evaded or postponed," and requesting of me, as one of the directors of that institution, to inform the committee whether any such arrangement has been adopted, and if any, of what character?

With that readiness springing from the high degree of respect to which every branch of the National Government is entitled, and which it cannot fail to command, I proceed, sir, respectfully to comply with your request; first premising, that I have neither authority nor instruction, nor indeed any intimation on the subject from the directors of the bank; and although I have had the honor to be a member of the board, it may now be uncertain whether I am or not still in the direction; the result of the recent election not being yet known, and no wish having been expressed by me for the continuance of that confidence with which I had been honored on a former occasion.

The committee, therefore, will be pleased to consider the remarks which may follow, as having no other weight than may be derived from their coming from an individual, whose situation, perhaps, enabled him to form a judgment on grounds not so open for observation to the public at large as to himself.

It has been the earnest desire of the directors of the Bank of the United States so to conduct the preliminary measures and organization of that institution as to insure, as speedily as possible, the accomplishment of some of the great ends of its establishment; and among them, pre-eminently, that of aiding in restoring the currency of the United States to a specie medium; in this desire the direction has always been unanimous, and a single dissention on this head has not, to my knowledge, existed among its members.

One of the earliest measures of the bank has been to send an agent to Europe, for the purpose of purchasing and importing into the United States an amount of specie, which, when received, cannot fail to have a very favorable effect on the money circulation of the country. In this measure and object several of the State banks have united; and from the respectability of the agent selected for this purpose, and the means and powers with which he is invested, there appears to be no reasonable ground for apprehension of a failure in his accomplishing the object of his mission.

Prior to my leaving Philadelphia, (December 31,) no discount had been made by the bank, or any of its branches. A resolution had been adopted by the Board of Directors, on the 18th of December, of the following tenor, to wit:

Resolved, That on the 31st instant, the board will proceed to discount notes or bills not having more than sixty days to run, and made payable to the Bank of the United States, secured by a deposit of an equal amount of the stock of this bank, or an equal amount of public debt, at ninety per cent. on the par value thereof, with power to sell and transfer the said stock, or debt, in default of payment, when due, of the notes which may be discounted as aforesaid; and that the respective boards of directors of the offices of discount and deposit at Boston, New York, and Baltimore, be authorized to discount, in like manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and to an extent not exceeding one-tenth of the amount of the subscription to the capital of the bank, at their respective places.

This resolution was subsequently modified on the last day of my being at the board prior to my leaving Philadelphia, and, among the alterations, on two points named by myself, the one was that the notes on which discounts might be made, should be payable at maturity in specie, or bills of the Bank of the United States; and the other, that no stockholder should be entitled to a discount under the resolution, unless he paid into the bank the stock proportion of the second instalment due on his shares. I believe, also, that the resolution was so modified as to make it apply to the subscribers to the bank; but I do not recollect that there was any preventive provision, which would deprive a stockholder, who had previously paid in the specie part of his instalment, from availing himself of a discount under the resolution. I think no such restriction existed.

As the resolution of the 18th of December was modified, and as I do not find among my papers a copy of it when amended, and as I was much occupied at the time in preparing to leave the city, I cannot be so precise, as I should wish to be, in the communication I have now the honor to make to the committee; for the same reasons I cannot trust myself to detail the motives which induced the passing the resolution as it was ultimately adopted, lest I should be guilty of an injustice to the views of the gentlemen with whom I had been called to act, by giving an opening to any unfavorable imputation, to which they could alone be exposed by the inaccurate medium through which their sentiments would in that case pass. In compliance, however, with what I understand to be the wish of the committee, I will, with their permission, briefly state my own impressions on the subject.

It has been, and still is, my most earnest desire, in common with that of the other directors, to carry this bank into the most speedy and extensively useful operation that its provisions will admit, and, as one means of doing this, to fortify it by the accumulation of specie in its vaults by every fair method in its power to adopt. Under these dispositions, it was repugnant to my wishes to have any arrangement made which might carry with it to the public the appearance of a contrary intention on the part of the direction, while I know that no such disposition exists in it; still, as the national objects of our pursuit must always be limited by the means of attainment at our command, and did elsewhere, and still does compel me to state, that if the resolution of the 18th of December, or its modification, does not violate the provisions of the charter, or law establishing the bank, (which I hope presently to show that it does not,) the effects of it are calculated to promote the interests of the public, uphold the credit of the bank, and to carry into effect the beneficent views of the Government in its establishment, more promptly than could be done without the adoption of that resolution.

It is evident that the usefulness of the bank must be dependent on the means in its possession to carry its operations to an extent, in some degree, commensurate with the public expectations. These means are at present exclusively confined to its own capital. The Government can and will give to it eventually a permanent power and influence, through its deposits, and the collection of its revenue, over all the other moneyed institutions in the country; but these are golden advantages only for the future—at present they do not exist. The bank has not been in a state to receive deposits from individuals, and if it had been, individuals would not make such deposits in specie for general use; and the Government has not the funds to place in it, except in a depreciated State bank paper, which the Bank of the United States could only reissue to the order of Government without benefit, or be obliged to replace, at a heavy loss, by its own paper, which never can be other than the representative of the precious metals, at the rates which make them the only lawful currency of the country.

Thus situated and divested of external aid, attention was naturally turned to the receipt of the second instalment, as the principal means of strengthening the resources of the bank, when it was perceived that, from the unfortunate state of the money market, and the deranged bank circulations of the country, and the light penalty incurred by an omission duly to make the second instalment, instead of inducements being offered for punctuality, a premium was, in fact, proffered to delinquents.

By the provisions of the charter, the only penalty attaching to a non-payment of the second instalment, prior to the declaration of the first dividend, is the forfeiture of that dividend, which must, of necessity, from the heavy expenses of the institution, and the circumstances in which it has been placed at its commencement, be an extremely small one, perhaps not exceeding (if the intervening charges are deducted, as they ought to be) two per cent. on the first instalment, thus leaving, if specie maintained the rate it was at in Philadelphia, at the time the resolution passed, of eight per cent. advance, (and if any excitement had been produced, by a large increased demand, it would have risen to ten or twelve per cent.,) and it should also fall to its par value in July, as it must do, if the banks then resume their specie payments, a gain to the stockholder, who refused to meet the payment of the instalment, of at least thirty-three and a third per cent. on the amount of the dividend, more than would be received by him who honorably paid it.

Thus circumstanced, if it were practicable to offer an inducement or facility for the payment of this instalment, without an infringement of statutory provisions, it would seem to have been desirable to do it.

A large part of the stock is, undoubtedly, in the hands of real capitalists, who have embarked their funds in the institution, and intend to share its fate; but it ought not to be concealed, that some part of the stock, and that not a small one, is in the possession of those who very fairly mean to make an advantageous use of the confidence they reposed in the good faith and resources of the country, over that manifested by others of their fellow-citizens. But whether the stock be held by the one class or the other, experience has verified to the conviction of most persons, who have had occasion to remark it, that any very strong reliance upon the constructive obligations of moneyed men, in opposition to their pecuniary interest, and in the absence of any special agreement on their part, would form a most fragile dependence for a great banking institution to bottom its operations upon.

If I have succeeded at all in my object, sir, it will then be perceived, first, that it was important to secure to the bank the receipt of the second instalment of its capital; and next, that the bank possessed no effectual means to enforce that payment in opposition to the wishes of the stockholders. The question then fairly arises, have the directors of the bank adopted any measures, violating the provisions of the act of incorporation, by creating that inducement?

The bank undoubtedly is authorized to conduct its business, on accustomed or usual banking principles. No restrictions exist in the law restraining the commencing discounts to an appointed day. This part of the operations of the bank rested, therefore, in the discretion of the directors.

Nearly, if not all, the banks in the United States, it is believed, begin their discounts on the payment of the first instalment; it was done by the former United States Bank. The present bank has received some months past this instalment, amounting to thirty per cent. of its capital, exclusive of that portion belonging to the Government, and by the resolution before referred to, it has authorized discounts to the extent of ten per cent. on its individual subscriptions. This would seem to be fully within the authorized powers of the bank, and if the resolution does not, as I presume it does not, interdict a stockholder who had before paid his instalment from obtaining a discount, the proceeds of that discount may be applied to any object to which he may choose to appropriate it; here, then, is no violation of the charter. It is true stockholders may and will obtain discounts, and with the funds procured from such discounts pay their instalments; but the question then recurs, if the provisions of the law have not been violated, will the bank be benefitted or injured by the measure that has been adopted? a consideration perhaps more directly applying to the stockholders on the one part, and the directors on the other. But, for the reasons before stated, I both hope and believe that the interest of the bank and the public will alike be promoted by the course that has been pursued, from the effect which it will produce, in securing possession to the bank of a part of its capital, which it could not otherwise so speedily have commanded.

Permit me, sir, before closing this very hasty letter, written on the spur of the occasion, without preparation, and with scarcely a single minute to refer to, or even the law establishing the bank before me, to solicit your indulgence for any deficiencies it may exhibit, and also to allow me to express my full confidence that, while the directors of the bank ought to feel grateful for the wakeful vigilance that is manifested towards them, they would derive great satisfaction from submitting all their proceedings to the inspection of any agent or committee who might be appointed for that purpose by the honorable House to which you belong; as they would be desirous of an opportunity to prove that they have at least endeavored to merit that countenance and patronage which they are sure of receiving, when merited, from the National Legislature; and on which, crippled and envired as the institution must be in its outset, with difficulties arising from the perplexed state of the different local currencies of the United States, the directors have calculated, as affording to them the surest basis to sustain the bank in the due estimation and confidence of the public, and to insure to it that degree of usefulness to which the interest of the Government, the magnitude of its capital, and the important duties it has to fulfil, so justly entitle it. I have the honor, &c.,

JAMES LLOYD.

To the Hon. Mr. CALHOUN, Chairman, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH observed the report and documents were of so singular a character, that he could not, for one, pretend to decide on them on merely hearing them read through, and moved that they lie on the table, and be printed.

After some conversation between Messrs. CALHOUN, FORSYTH, and PITKIN, on the nature of the evidence adduced by the committee, &c., the motion for printing was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION.

The House then, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill making a partial appropriation (in blank of course) for the subsistence of the Army during the year 1817.

The reason stated by the Committee of Ways and Means for reporting this bill at present was, that, it being usual to advance a certain sum to contractors for rations, it was necessary to make a partial appropriation for facilitating the contracts about going into operation.

The blank was filled with $400,000.

Mr. CLAY rose, not to object to the bill, but to observe, that the great expenditure annually required by the Military Department, which this year would probably exceed six millions, must have struck every one, and on the necessity there was that the House should be certain that a proper investigation and scrutiny into these expenditures should take place; as he believed there were three committees who might each very properly consider the duty as devolving on them.

Mr. LOWNDES stated the course adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means, in acting on the estimates for the Military Department; the limited power of that committee in controlling those estimates, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, made some remarks to show that the appropriations heretofore made were necessary for the military service; and stated the different branches of the War Establishment, the Indian department, the Ordnance department, fortifications, arsenals, &c., the expenses of which were defrayed out of the annual military appropriations, though the great loss in the destruction of military stores, and at the manufactories of arms, &c., had swelled the expenditures beyond what ought hereafter to exist; and expressing his anxiety for economy in every branch of the Government, and his wish to reduce, as soon as practicable, the public burdens, &c.

Mr. ROOT explained the course adopted by the select committee (of which he is the chairman) in examining the accounts of the War Department; their measures to prevent improper allowances; and their efforts to ascertain the possibility of, and to produce retrenchment in the public expenditure.

Mr. CLAY still thought the Government paid more money and got less military services than any other country in the world, and his object was to know if any proper examination had been made to ascertain whether the extraordinary expenditure of the Military Department might not be retrenched, &c.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his pleasure at hearing in this House the long-exploded word economy, and at witnessing the most distant ray of promise of a return to old Democratic principles; and then went into a pretty general view of what he termed the extraordinary expenditures of our Military Establishments, which, in the Army, amounted to about $900 a man, and in the Navy to nearly $1,000 per man. He referred to his motion at the last session to reduce the Army, and its failure, and the resolution he had taken to make, during the remainder of his public life, no further attempt to reform public abuses, &c. He commented on the enormous amount of the civil expenditures of the Government, which arose not from enormous salaries, (for, he said, many of their officers were absolutely starving,) but from the great number of officers, greater than in any other country, under the General and State Governments. Having, as this House had, no patronage whatever, but only the odium of every obnoxious public measure, they ought to still feel the necessity of scrutinizing into the public expenditures; and as it was impossible, in the nature of legislation, divided into opposite parties, for a member of the minority to make any effectual attempts to correct abuses, he called on the members of the majority to perform that duty, and expressed his pleasure at hearing those gentlemen (Messrs. CLAY and JOHNSON) using the almost unparliamentary word economy, and talking about retrenchment, &c. To the bill under consideration, however, he had no sort of objection.

Mr. CLAY, in reply, said that if he had been alluded to, his opinions had undergone no change, since he had voted on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion at the last session; that he did not yet think the Military Establishment ought to be destroyed, but that now, as always, he desired to know whether the expenditures were requisite, whether appropriations were necessary and properly applied, and in what way the public money could be economised, &c.

Mr. LOWNDES also replied to Mr. RANDOLPH, as to the extraordinary expense alleged to be incurred by the Government for each man in the military service. The military force might be so small, the number so few, that in dividing amongst them the whole expense of all the branches of the establishment, it might swell the cost of each man to what had been stated, but it would be a most extraordinary mode of estimating the expense of the Army, and he offered facts and arguments to show that the expense of each man had not exceeded $400; that the amount of the Army greatly exceeded the number of 7,000, as surmised in the debate, and the less reason there consequently was to suspect a wasteful expenditure or excessive appropriations heretofore.

The Committee of the Whole then rose, and reported the bill as amended, in which the House concurred; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to amend the act to make payment for lost property, &c. Mr. INGHAM's motion to amend the bill by inserting a new section, declaring that the 9th section should not be construed to extend to houses occupied by the military forces of the United States, except the same shall have been occupied by authority of an officer or agent of the United States, as a place of deposit for munitions of war—being still under consideration.

After some remarks from Mr. HARRISON in opposition to the motion, the question was taken, and the amendment adopted—ayes 81, noes 60.

Mr. ATHERTON, after remarking on the necessity of preventing the testimony, as by the act it now was, from being ex parte and unfair, and the necessity of providing against fraud and imposition, moved an amendment which was, substantially, that in all cases where the claims exceeded the sum of $200, the testimony should be taken before a commission for that purpose appointed.

The amendment was received without opposition.

Mr. WRIGHT then, after some introductory remarks, moved to add a new section to the bill, providing that in all cases where destruction of houses by the enemy shall have been consistent with the practice of civilized warfare, the same shall be paid for in the same manner as is provided for by the 9th section of the act of last session.

Mr. WRIGHT supported very warmly, and at some length, the justice of his proposition, in which he was joined by Mr. ROBERTSON, who argued against the policy of depriving distant citizens by repealing a provision of a law, of benefits which had been enjoyed by other citizens whose vicinity to the Seat of Government enabled them to avail themselves promptly of it.

Mr. BARBOUR explained the reasons which would induce and justify his vote against the motion: and

Mr. HARRISON submitted additional arguments in support of the amendment, though not exactly conformable to his views.

After some observations by Mr. ROSS, in opposition to the motion, and an unsuccessful call by Mr. WRIGHT for the yeas and nays, the question was taken on the amendment and decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. McLEAN then introduced, with a few explanatory remarks, a motion to amend the bill by inserting a provision, that any house or other property destroyed or injured by order of any officer of the Army of the United States in the late war, such loss or damage shall be allowed and paid under the provisions of this act; which motion was lost by a large majority.

Mr. PICKENS moved to amend the provision authorizing a commission to take evidence, substantially, so as to allow the commission to inquire whether there be any evidence in favor of the United States.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, by a large majority.

SATURDAY, January 11.

The engrossed bill making a partial appropriation for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

The engrossed bill to amend the act authorizing payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed in the military service of the United States, was read a third time; and, after some objections by Mr. WRIGHT to its details, to which Mr. YANCEY replied, the bill was passed.

Mr. T. M. NELSON, from the committee appointed on the 12th ult., reported a bill authorizing the commutation of soldiers' bounty land, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to amend an act entitled, "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, on the bill for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill supplementary to the act regulating the duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 27th of April, 1816, be discharged from a further consideration of the said bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers, made a report, which was read; when Mr. B. presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act granting bounties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers," passed the 5th March, 1816; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The report is as follows:

In examining the act, it appears that no specific term of service is required to entitle the applicant to the benefit of the bounty; that the law is vague and defective, affording an opportunity for numerous claims upon the Government when no essential services have been rendered.

It appears by the documents in the War Department, compared with other evidence, that frauds have been and are attempted to be practised by officers and soldiers in support of their claims which had occasioned a partial suspension of the execution of the law, as appears by a communication from the Secretary of War, to which reference is had.

The law will admit of an extension to, and embrace cases far beyond what could have been contemplated at the time it was enacted, and such as justice and policy do not demand.

In referring to the muster-rolls of the corps called the Canadian Volunteers, it appears to have consisted of nearly the full number of field and staff officers for a regiment, with a very small number of privates—not at any time exceeding thirty-eight mustered as present—and that very little service could have been rendered by them to the Government.

In pointing out the defects of this act, we would not lose sight of the object intended by it. It has given relief to some brave men who had suffered a total loss of property, and there are still others belonging to various corps in service in the late war who are equally meritorious, and who have not yet received the intended relief.

Your committee are of opinion that an amendment is necessary, and have reported a bill for that purpose.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 26, 1816.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 18th instant, I have the honor to state that, immediately after the passage of the law of the last session granting bounty land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers, rules were adopted prescribing the evidence which was necessary to entitle the parties interested to the benefits of the act.

Under these regulations, warrants were regularly issued where the evidence was conformable to the rules which had been prescribed, until late in the Summer. About that time information was received from various quarters, stating that frauds had been practised in obtaining evidence in support of several claims which had been allowed.

Claims to a considerable extent were presented from Detroit, and others were understood to have been preparing from Lake Champlain and the St. Lawrence; to the latter of which fraud was also imputed. Under these circumstances, it was determined to postpone the decision of all claims until after the meeting of Congress, except those whose names were found on the muster-rolls of Colonel Wilcox's corps.

It appears to be necessary, to guard the public against imposition, that the term of service entitling the volunteer to the benefits of the act should be defined. As the law now stands, one week's voluntary service will entitle the party to land bounty and pay, if the engagement was only for that term.

It appears to be impolitic to permit the parties to locate their warrants before the lands have been exposed to public sale. Much inconvenience and loss to the public have been sustained by omitting that restriction.

I have also the honor to enclose copies of communications to this Department and to the Paymaster General in relation to frauds attempted to be practised in obtaining testimony.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,
GEORGE GRAHAM,

Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. M. Brooks, Chairman, &c.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to state to the House the number of the officers and privates belonging to the several corps of the artillery, (including the light artillery,) infantry, and riflemen, now in the service of the United States."

Mr. H. said, that from the letter of the Secretary, laid yesterday on the table, transmitting an estimate of the appropriations for the year 1817, it appeared that appropriations were proposed to be made for ten thousand privates—the whole number of troops authorized by law to be kept in service; that, from some remarks made by the honorable Speaker, and from the chairman of the Military Committee, it appeared to be their opinion that the number of troops now in actual service did not much exceed seven thousand. It appeared to him that, in order for the House to act with propriety when they should make appropriations, it was necessary that they should possess more certain information as to the actual number of troops in the service of the United States. It was with this view he had proposed the resolution under consideration. If the nation were at war, or if any danger of a rupture with any foreign Power could be reasonably apprehended, a communication of this sort might be improper. At present, happily, there could be no foundation for objections of such a nature.

After some conversation on the subject, the resolution was so modified by the mover as to direct the Secretary of War to communicate to the House the number of officers and privates composing the whole Military Establishment in the service of the United States, particularizing the strength of each corps and regiment, and in that form agreed to.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, after adverting to the proceedings had at the last session upon a similar proposition, and the propriety of an appropriation of money for attaining its object, moved the first of the following resolutions. He further stated, he would also present for inquiry another resolution having a similar object, but depending upon a different principle. The first proposed an appropriation of land or money, where none was pledged; the second to make provision for the application of a fund already set apart for making roads. It would be recollected, he said, that, by the compact with the new State of Indiana, the faith of Congress was pledged to expend a certain portion of the money arising from the sales of land in that State for the purpose of opening roads leading to it—a principle, he remarked, which was adopted when the State of Ohio was admitted into the Union, and to which we owed the benefits, in possession and in prospect, of the great national turnpike leading from Fort Cumberland to Wheeling. He wished to renew the inquiry into the claims of another section to a portion of money within the control of Congress, and with that view he had purposely limited the operation of his resolution; whilst he admitted the propriety of extending the great road he had alluded to from Wheeling, he believed it was just and proper to open another, leading in a more direct line from the Metropolis of the nation to the newly admitted State. The following are the resolutions moved by Mr. JACKSON:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for making an artificial road from Washington, in Pennsylvania, through Charlestown, on the Ohio river, to the river Sandusky, at or near Fort Stephenson.

Resolved, That the same committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating that part of the net proceeds of moneys arising from the sale of land in the State of Indiana, which by compact with that State is set apart for opening roads, to making an artificial road from Winchester, in Virginia, to the Ohio river, at or near the mouth of Muskingum river, and from thence, by or near Chillicothe, on the Scioto river, to the said State of Indiana.

The resolves were agreed to.

Mr. PICKENS submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the making of surveys and levels for several of the most practicable points of communication between the waters of Tennessee river, and those of Coosa and Tombigbee rivers, and also of the shoals and falls on the two last mentioned rivers.

Mr. PICKENS made a few remarks in support of his motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH suggested, that all the favor of gentlemen of the House appeared to be directed to the new countries, in neglect of the old States. In regard to the part of North Carolina which the gentlemen represented, and the adjoining territory of Virginia, there was no part of the country that had experienced less of the sunshine of Government than they had. But the fact was, they had asked nothing of the Government; they were in the habit of living on their own means, not of quartering themselves on the nation, on the public, or on the parish. No district in the United States, he said, stood so much in the relation of a step-child as the country represented by himself and the honorable gentleman. There was no country for which so little had been done. He did not know that he should have troubled the House with any remarks on this head, but for a morning puff on the Post Office Establishment, the benefits of which, he intimated, were dispensed with a sparing hand in the district which he represented. The excellence of the establishment there was such, he said, that a broad wheeled wagon, laden with two heavy hogsheads of tobacco, would go from his house to Richmond in a day and a half less time than the mail did, which was besides only weekly. He wished to know of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, whether anything was to be done to remedy this evil. But, with regard to the navigation of the Tombigbee, were the old United States about to play the part of King Lear in the tragedy? Was the whole territory, the whole soil, to enure to the benefit of the Western States and Territories, and were the old States to have no part at all of the common stock? What was to become, then, of the navigation of the waters of the Chesapeake and contiguous waters, and of the navigation of the Catawba and the Yadkin, &c.—objects which, Mr. R. said, he should suppose would interest the gentleman from North Carolina much more than the navigation of the Tombigbee, and the Coosa, and the Tennessee. He saw, he said, with surprise and regret, the course the Government had taken and was taking. He did not refer to any Constitutional difficulties whatever; but he saw distinctly that the old United States, particularly that State to which the Government owed almost all its territory east of the Mississippi and west of the Ohio, was not to be benefitted by any expenditure in respect to canals and roads, except such benefit as that State would contingently receive by the road from Fort Cumberland passing through a part of the State. Why, Mr. R. asked, did not gentlemen propose to improve the navigation of the Roanoke, the Catawba, and the Yadkin? He could not understand it. He could not see why all the benefits of an expense, equally borne by all, was to enure entirely to the Western States and Territories. To them he paid all due respect, and was desirous they should have their due weight; but he should wish to see something like the principle established that the children of the family should have share and share alike; that some should not be cut off their inheritance, whilst others were bountifully fed at the public breast. If, by the grant of her claim to the United States, Virginia had given away her right, had put it into the common fund, he did humbly conceive, he said, that she had not thereby foreclosed herself from any future advantage from that country, and had as good a right to expect to see the products of it laid out within her own territory as in Ohio, or Indiana, or Illinois.

Mr. PICKENS acknowledged, he said, that the State of North Carolina had asked and received little from the General Government; but he was happy to say that, from her own resources, she was progressing in the work of internal improvement as rapidly as any other State. In the last sitting of the Legislature, they had provided for an examination or commencement of every improvement which could be suggested from the Atlantic to the dividing ridge. He trusted, also, that that State, as well as the State which the gentleman represented, would receive an equal share with others of the public attention. As to the navigation of the Atlantic coast, that, he said, was a subject which the Committee of Roads and Canals would certainly embrace in their general plan; and it was merely to call their attention to a point which might otherwise escape it, that he had introduced this motion. Besides, the land in that quarter of the country being the property of the United States, it might be proper to show to the people that the eye of the Government was turned to that quarter as well as to others.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the land in that quarter indeed did belong to the United States. But who paid for it? The United States, and not the people of that Territory. The United States had paid the State of Georgia for it, and were all equally entitled to the benefit of it. He should be glad to know why Pennsylvania, New York, and Old Massachusetts, had not as good a right to draw money from the Treasury, let it get in as proceeds of public lands or otherwise, as these new States. He wished to be understood not as speaking disparagingly of those new States; all he wished was, that the elder brethren should not be cut off, with (not the portion of the younger children,) but no portion at all—that the children of the second marriage should not sweep away the whole estate. On this point, he said, the explanation of the gentleman was not satisfactory. But he congratulated the gentleman on the projected improvements of the navigation in North Carolina. How long, he asked, since the navigation of the Roanoke was proposed to be opened? Some twenty years; but there had not yet been one stroke struck towards it. With all his respect for North Carolina, and Mr. R. said, he had great respect for the people, the habits, and even the prejudices of that State, he was afraid the improvements spoken of would be seen for a long time on the face of her statute book, before they could be seen on the face of the country.

Mr. HARRISON said, the gentleman from Virginia was mistaken, if he supposed the money, from which the expense of making the Cumberland road was defrayed, was taken from the Treasury, to the prejudice of the right of other States. No; the application of a certain part of the proceeds of the sales of public lands to that road, was the result of a fair compromise; by which, in fact, the State of Ohio had sold its inheritance to the United States for a mess of pottage, as every new Western State did. The State of Indiana, he said, had sacrificed an annuity of two or three hundred thousand dollars a year for a gross sum of fifteen thousand dollars, by sacrificing the right to tax the lands of the United States. There was not a road or improvement in the new country from which the Government of the United States did not derive its full share of the advantages. Let gentlemen turn their attention to the sales of land in that country; in one month, if report is to be believed, lands had been sold to the amount of one million of dollars; of which, a very small amount was applicable to making roads. Mr. H. said he should certainly, as a Representative from a new State, be very willing to see Virginia deriving her full share of money appropriated from the Treasury for the purpose of internal improvement.

Mr. YANCEY said he was a member of the committee to whom this subject was proposed to be referred. He was opposed to the present motion, not for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Virginia, though he completely subscribed to the declaration of that gentleman, that the General Government had done nothing that it could avoid for the benefit of North Carolina, or the part of Virginia the gentleman represented. But no good could be effected by this motion, because, as he understood the opinion of the committee, it was that the committee should make a general report on internal improvement, and that no particular object should be presented for the consideration of the House, as it would be improper to take up any one improvement distinct from a general system.

Mr. PICKENS said he had not been apprized of this determination of the committee, which would make it unnecessary for him to press his motion, which he therefore consented should lie on the table.

Mr. T. WILSON said, that though the determination of the committee had been as stated, there would be no objection to the passage of the resolution, because it would guide the attention of the committee, who would be glad to avail themselves of all the lights on the subject, to an improvement that might not otherwise receive their attention. In regard to the intimation that nothing had been done for North Carolina and Virginia by the General Government, in the way of internal improvement, Mr. W. asked what had been done in any other State? Nothing at all, he said; so that the complaint of gentlemen on that score, was without any just ground.

Mr. RANDOLPH made some further remarks, amongst which was this: that, as an individual, he had rather there should not be an acre of public land sold in thirty years—on account of the effect of these sales to drain the old States of their population and wealth.

Mr. HARRISON rejoined a few words, and the resolution was then agreed to.

VACCINATION.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CONDICT, proceeded to the consideration of the engrossed bill (lying on the table) supplementary to the act for the encouragement of vaccination.

Mr. ATHERTON observed that the bill had two aspects, one as it respected the Army and Navy of the United States. Another as it respected the people of the United States, exclusive and independent of the Army. As far as the Army were concerned, he hesitated not to say that it was

JANUARY, 1817.

Vaccination.

H. OF R.

among the first duties of the Government to extend the blessings of vaccination to that Army. He said it was essential to the health, security, and efficiency of the Army. But he doubted the expediency of appointing a special agent for that purpose. He said the medical and surgical department of the Army was now very numerous and expensive to the country. He had heard no sufficient reason assigned why they were not adequate to the vaccination of the Army. If they were incompetent to this important part of their duties, he would then say, there had been a monstrous abuse of power in their appointment. He presumed it would not be contended that they were overburdened with business. So far from this being the fact, he imagined, considering their numbers and pay, they had very little to do, and that it would be a mercy to them, as well as very much to the reputation of the Government, if some employ could be found for them. In its aspect towards the people, he said, it involved a question of more serious consideration than that of mere expediency. He believed the people would view it with some degree of jealousy and alarm; they would inquire, with some surprise, what article in the Constitution gave to Congress the power of levying taxes for the support of agents in the different departments of the healing art? This principle the bill recognised and sanctioned. To what extent, Mr. A. inquired, may not this be carried? Congress may be of opinion that the good people of the United States suffer great impositions from the use of spurious and unwholesome balsams, from patent medicines, &c. And, in order to protect us against their frauds and impositions, Congress may appoint an agent for balsams and an agent for patent medicines. And why not as well as an agent for vaccination? Mr. A. observed that in that State of which he was a Representative, New Hampshire, physicians made it a point to preserve the genuine vaccine matter—that they inoculated at little expense and even gratuitously—that if there was an improper inattention to this subject, it was very competent to the Legislature of that State to enact regulations and to appoint agents, which he said they could do with much more intelligence, much more satisfaction, and with much more advantage, to the people of that State, than Congress could do for them. But, said Mr. A., there is another objection to this bill, which he thought must be very obvious to the House, and particularly to the gentlemen of the medical profession in it. He had ever understood that it required skill and experience to determine whether the patient had taken the genuine disease, or the spurious; that it was by certain appearances in its progress the patient was to be pronounced to have had the true preventive disease. He recollected perfectly well that Doctor Waterhouse, who had been called the Jenner of America, had published to the world that some cases were so ambiguous, that, with all his skill and experience, he was not able to determine on which side they fell, whether among the true or the false cases. He said he had ever understood, that, with physicians of reputation, who were tender of the health and lives of their fellow-citizens, and who were desirous that vaccination should not fall into disrepute, it was considered of great importance that the vaccine matter should not be intrusted to rash and unskilful hands. But what, asked Mr. A., does this bill provide? It makes it the duty of this agent of vaccination to distribute the vaccine virus into the hands of every man, woman, and child, in the United States, who can address a request to him for that purpose. Sir, how many thousands and tens of thousands are there in the United States, who, urged by their own temerity, or a disposition to quackery, will imagine that by the vaccine matter and letter of instructions from this agent of vaccination, as if by a magician's wand, they will at once be initiated into all the skill and knowledge necessary to enable them to pronounce that their deluded patients are safe from the small pox, when they have communicated no disease at all, or, if any, a spurious vaccine disease? Sir, I cannot conceive a more direct method of endangering the health and life of the patient, and, if I am not altogether wrong in these views, the bill upon your table, instead of being a bill for the encouragement of vaccination, ought to be called a bill for the encouragement of empirics, and to bring vaccination into disrepute. Mr. A. said that he did not doubt but the bill originated in humane motives—it bore on the face of it something of the appearance of philanthropy. It was on that account he deemed it proper to assign the reasons that would induce him to vote against it. He had assigned them, and hoped the bill would not pass the House.

Mr. CONDUCT replied to Mr. ATHERTON; the arguments pro and con being of the same character as those previously urged in debate on the subject.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, decidedly opposed the bill on the ground of its unconstitutionality, since no part of the Constitution expressly authorized the grant, and no such power could be inferred from the general clause of the Constitution.

Mr. CONDUCT and Mr. WRIGHT replied to this objection—the first inferring the Constitutional authority for the act from its connexion with the Army and Navy; the latter from the charge of the general welfare given to Congress, to which this measure certainly would contribute.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 88, as follows:

So the bill was rejected.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the orders of the day were postponed, in order to take up the further report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Mr. SCOTT, Delegate from Missouri.

A debate arose on this subject, which continued until the hour of adjournment.

The same ground was occupied as in the former debate on the same subject—the questions being, first, the right and duty of the House to inquire into the contested election of Delegates, and the necessity, in a contested election, when required by either party, of scrutinizing every vote at an election.

The doctrine was again advanced by Mr. RANDOLPH, that Delegates were rather Diplomatic than Legislative characters, being accredited to Congress, and having a right to sit in either House; and, consequently, that this House had nothing to do but to see that they brought with them a certificate, from the proper authority, of their election.

To which, after argumentatively replying, Mr. CLAY, by way of adjusting the present difficulty, humorously suggested to the gentleman, that as there were two persons claiming to represent the Territory as Delegates, one having a seat here, and the other a just claim to it, and the House having (it seemed) no right to determine between them, as they had a right (as the gentleman contended) to sit in either House, that one should be admitted to a seat on this floor, and the other turned over to the Senate.

The sitting Delegate (Mr. SCOTT) having at a late hour intimated his wish to speak in support of his right to a seat, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 13.

Mr. FORSYTH presented a representation of David B. Mitchell, Governor of the State of Georgia, on the behalf of that State, representing that in consequence of an informality in notifying the Treasury Department of the United States, of the assumption by the Legislature of the said State, of its quota of the direct tax, the discount of the 15 per cent. has been refused upon the payment of the said quota, and requesting the interference of Congress in the premises, so as to allow and pay to the State the 15 per cent. on the amount assumed and paid.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PRITIN presented a petition of inhabitants of Connecticut, in opposition to the practice of transporting and opening the mails on the Sabbath, which was referred to the committee appointed on a similar petition from inhabitants of Southampton, in Massachusetts.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend and explain the act for designating, surveying, and granting military bounty lands, passed the 6th of May, 1812; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON also reported a bill to explain the act "to authorize certain officers and other persons to administer oaths," approved May 3d, 1798; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the establishment of a National Armory; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers.

Mr. WRIGHT, submitted the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie for one day:

Resolved, That gentlemen elected members of either branch of the National Legislature, shall be admitted within the hall of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the number of officers and privates composing the whole military force of the United States, in obedience to the resolution of the 11th instant; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report in obedience to the resolution of the House of the 9th of March, 1816, directing him "to report whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other instruments used in distillation;" which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the contested election of Delegate for Missouri Territory.

Mr. SCOTT (the sitting Delegate) defended his right to his seat at considerable length, and with no little ingenuity.

The question was at length taken on the first part of the resolution moved by the SPEAKER, viz: That the petitioner Rufus Easton was entitled to the certificate of being elected—and negatived, 79 to 68; and the remaining part of the proposition (that Mr. Easton was entitled to a seat) was withdrawn by the mover.

Mr. T. M. NELSON then moved a resolution to the effect that, the election of Delegate for the Territory of Missouri having been illegally conducted, the seat of the Delegate for that Territory had become vacant, and that a new election be ordered; and that the Speaker communicate this resolution to the Governor of the Territory. The question on the resolution was then put in separate questions, when that part which related to the election being illegal, the seat being vacant, and the Speaker communicating the same to the Governor, was carried; whilst so much as related to a new election for the Territory, was negatived.

On the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, all the orders of the day preceding that on the compensation law, was postponed to the day after to-morrow, in order to afford that gentleman an opportunity to-morrow of redeeming his pledge on that subject, and bringing on the discussion of it.

JOHN PAULDING.

Mr. CHAPPELL made a report unfavorable to the petition of John Paulding, (one of the citizens who captured the British Adjutant General Major Andre, during the Revolutionary war,) who prays for an increase of the pension allowed to him by the Government in consequence of that service. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that he was one of the three persons who arrested Major John Andre, the Adjutant General of the British army, during the Revolutionary war. That for this patriotic service they received the approbation of General Washington and the Congress, and also an annuity of two hundred dollars each. He states that he is now old, has a large family, some of whom are infants; that he is very infirm, and incapable of hard labor; that his annuity is his greatest dependence to maintain himself and family; and asks Congress to increase the allowance which he now has, or to grant him such further assistance as his faithful and patriotic services, and his infirmity and advanced age, may demand.

The petitioner did his duty faithfully, and for it he has been liberally rewarded. However, he did nothing more than his duty; the country expects this much, at least, from every one, and yet it is not expected that she is to support all who have done so. The committee without disparaging the services of the petitioner, can conceive of many individuals, both in the Revolutionary and late war, who rendered services of the highest character, if not equal to those of the petitioner, and who, so far from being so highly favored with the public liberality as he has been, have received nothing, and who have asked nothing. Good policy warns us against adopting such measures as may excite invidious remarks and create jealousies. The petitioner was a private soldier when he rendered the services for which he has been thus liberally rewarded; he was neither wounded, nor in any way injured, nor even exposed to a greater degree of hardship than thousands of soldiers who were then in the service; and yet for those brave men who then fought our battles, and who had the misfortune to lose an arm or a leg, or who became otherwise wounded or disabled, and who have dragged out a tardy, and melancholy, and perhaps miserable existence, no greater provision was made than an allowance of sixty dollars per year, until the last session of Congress, when it was increased to ninety-six. His provision was a far more liberal one. He does not now suggest that his annuity is not sufficient to support himself; but he wishes to be enabled out of the public bounty to support himself and his family too. This is a request which is not granted to those who were disabled in the service of the country, nor to the widows and orphans of those who were slain. It can therefore hardly be proper to grant it to the petitioner. He has no cause of complaint against the Government, and ought to be satisfied; therefore,

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

A debate of no little interest arose on this question.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reverse the report of the committee, and to declare that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted.

The report was opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, SMITH, of Maryland, GOLD, FORSYTH, ROBERTSON, and SHARP, on the ground of the importance of the services of this person and his companions, the magnitude of the virtue they displayed, and the justice of making such an addition to the pension allowed to them, as should keep pace with the depreciation of money since the amount of that pension was established. The report was supported by Messrs. CHAPPELL, JEWETT, TALLMADGE, and PICKERING, on the injustice of legislating on a single case of pension for services, which were in fact, though important, but the common duty of every citizen, and in which no disability was incurred; whilst there were many survivors of the Revolution, whom the favor of the Government had not distinguished, and who are languishing in obscurity and want; to whom no relief had been or would be extended.

What gave interest principally to the debate, was the disclosure by Mr. TALLMADGE of Connecticut (an officer at the time, and commanding the advance guard when Major Andre was brought in) of his view of the merit of this transaction, with which history and the records of the country have made every man familiar. The value of the service he did not deny, but, on the authority of the declarations of Major Andre, (made while in the custody of Col. TALLMADGE,) he gave it as his opinion that, if Major Andre could have given to these men the amount they demanded for his release, he never would have been hung for a spy, nor in captivity on that occasion. Mr. T.'s statement was minutely circumstantial, and given with expressions of his individual confidence in its correctness. Among other circumstances, he stated, that when Major Andre's boots were taken off by them, it was to search for plunder, and not to detect treason. These persons indeed, he said, were of that class of people who passed between both armies, as often in one camp as the other, and whom, he said, if he had met with them, he should probably have as soon have apprehended as Major Andre, as he had always made it a rule to do with these suspicious persons. The conclusion to be drawn from the whole of Mr. TALLMADGE's statement, of which this is a brief extract, was, that these persons had brought in Major Andre, only because they should probably get more for his apprehension than for his release.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

JANUARY, 1817.

This statement was received with surprise and incredulity, as to Major Andre's correctness, by the gentlemen on the other side of this question. It was very extraordinary; it was said, that at a day so much nearer the transaction than the present, there had existed no doubt on the subject and Congress, as a mark of public gratitude for their honorable conduct on this important occasion, settled on these persons pensions for life. Though testimony was strongly stated by one of the gentlemen (Mr. SMITH) to Major Andre's high character and honor, it was impossible, it was said, that the character and conduct of the men should have been as this day represented, yet so differently depicted. The statement of Major Andre, subject as it must have been to be discolored by misapprehensions of the character and motives of Americans, among whom patriotism pervades every rank in life, it was urged, ought to have no weight, indeed it ought not to have been mentioned, in competition with facts on record, and established by full investigation, during the life time of General WASHINGTON, who certainly knew all the circumstances of the transaction.

Though this topic made a prominent figure in the debate, it is perhaps proper to say, that the question was decided on the ground taken in the report, and above stated as having been urged in debate in favor of it.

A motion was made by Mr. FORSYTH (and lost) to postpone the report to give further time to examine the correctness of the extraordinary view of the subject which had been presented by Mr. TALLMADGE.

It was moved to amend the resolution, so as to direct the committee to report a bill for increasing the compensation of the other two of the captors of Major Andre, yet surviving, as well as of the petitioner, which motion was negatived.

The question on the reversing the report of the committee was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 80 or 90.

Mr. LITTLE having made an unsuccessful motion to postpone the further consideration of the report, in the hope that a full examination would be made of the question to-day raised as to the merits of these men, whom history described as pure and incorruptible patriots, and whom he fully believed to have been so—

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the same committee aforesaid, also reported a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act for the relief of John Thompson," which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

TUESDAY, January 14.

The engrossed bill, entitled "An act to explain the act authorizing certain officers and other persons to administer oaths, approved May the 3d, 1798," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning the Attorney General of the United States," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FORSYTH submitted the following joint resolutions, which were read twice and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, &c., That the arrangement made by the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, under which the notes of the stockholders secured by deposit of six per cent. stock of the United States, are received in place of the specie required to be paid as a part of the second instalment, is an unwarrantable extension of the corporate powers of that body, and that the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, be and he is hereby directed to withhold the deposits of the Government from the said bank, until the proportion of specie required as part of the second instalment is actually paid, according to the true intent and meaning of the act of incorporation.

Resolved, &c., That the discount of any note or the loan of money by the Bank of the United States, to individuals, on the credit of the funded debt of the United States, either transferred to the bank, or to any of its officers, or deposited with an authority to sell the same for the payment of the debt contracted, is a manifest violation of the ninth rule or fundamental article of the constitution of the said bank, and is contrary to the spirit of the fifth section of the act of incorporation; and that the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, be and he is hereby directed, whenever he shall hereafter ascertain that any discount of notes or loan of money has been made on such security, to proceed forthwith to withdraw from the said bank the deposits of the Government; and that it shall be his duty to give information thereof to Congress, during the first week of its succeeding session.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented a memorial of William Thornton, keeper of the Patent Office, stating that no direct provision exists in the laws upon the subject of patents, inventions, and discoveries, embracing the case of statutory, and soliciting that an additional act may be passed upon the subject.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of Allan McLane, stating that he commenced his military life as a volunteer in the year 1775, and continued to act in various stations of important trust, of active enterprise, of imminent peril; throughout the checkered scenes of the Revolutionary war, which left him at its close a major of infantry, and that in the great cause of independence he offered up the flower of his life, and expended a handsome patrimony, for which he has never, as he alleges, received the promised rewards; that he is now old, infirm, and poor, and praying that Congress will take his case into serious consideration and pass such act in the premises for his relief as to them, in their wisdom, shall seem just and right.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate "to increase the salaries of the register and receiver of public moneys of the land office at Marietta," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PICKERING gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill further to regulate the Territories of the United States, and their electing delegates to Congress.

A proposition made yesterday, by Mr. WRIGHT, for altering the rules of the House so as to admit within the bar of the House, during its sittings, any person who shall have been elected a member of the Senate, or of this House, was taken up, and on the question, was decided in the negative.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, from the committee to whom was referred the petitions of Samuel Thompson, and John Dailey, made a report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The committee have had the said petitions under consideration, and report the following statement of facts: That it appears, from the documents accompanying the petitions, that the petitioners were both men of extensive property in and contiguous to the village of Newark, in Upper Canada; that, after the taking possession of that place by the United States army, under the command of General Dearborn, the petitioners were active and zealous in their endeavors to promote the success of our arms, and were solicitous to add all in their power to the comfort and convenience of our troops; that they gave up their houses for quarters for our officers and soldiers, and on all occasions manifested so strong an attachment to the American cause that their disloyalty to the British Government was so apparent and notorious that they deemed it unsafe for them to remain in Canada after the evacuation by our army, and they threw themselves under the protection of the American Government; in consequence of which (although there is no direct proof of the fact) there is little doubt but their property has been confiscated; and the petitioners are now far advanced in life, and destitute of the means to enable them to live comfortably.

The committee, not knowing how far the House would go towards remunerating persons of this description, without giving any opinion, and with a view to bring the subject direct before the House, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be instructed to bring in a bill for the relief of the said Samuel Thompson and John Dailey.

NEUTRALITY.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following bill:

A Bill to prevent citizens of the United States from selling vessels of war to the citizens or subjects of any foreign Power, and more effectually to prevent the arming and equipping vessels of war in the ports of the United States, intended to be used against nations in amity with the United States.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That if any citizen of the United States, shall, within the limits of the same, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly aid or be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming any private ship or vessel of war, to sell the said vessel or contract for the sale of the said vessel, to be delivered in the United States or elsewhere, to the purchaser, with intent or previous knowledge that the said vessel shall or will be employed to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any Prince or State with whom the United States are at peace, such person so offending shall on conviction thereof be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding ten years; and the trial of such offence shall either be in the district of the United States wherein the vessel was fitted out and armed, or in that wherein the contract of sale was made.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the owners of all armed ships, sailing out of the ports of the United States, and owned wholly or in part by citizens thereof, shall enter into bond to the collector, with sufficient security, prior to clearing out the same, in double the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed, either by the owners or by any person to whom they may sell, or pretend to sell, the same, in cruising or committing hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any Prince or State with whom the United States are at peace.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized to detain any vessel bound from the United States, whenever the cargo on board shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war, and when, from the number of men shipped on board, or from any other circumstance, it is their opinion that there is an intention to violate the neutral obligations of the United States to foreign Governments, until the decision of the President be had thereupon, or until the owner enters into bond and security, such as is required of the owners of armed vessels, by the second section of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no foreign ship or vessel shall be armed and equipped, nor shall the force of any foreign armed ship or vessel be increased or augmented in the ports of the United States, under any pretext whatsoever.

The bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

REDEMPTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the state of the finances, made a report upon that part of it which relates to an addition to the Sinking Fund, which was read; when Mr. L. reported a bill to provide for the redemption of the public debt, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The report is as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom has been referred the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submit to the House a report upon that part of it which relates to an addition to the Sinking Fund:

A provision for the extinguishment of the public debt was proposed at an early part of the last session, but its consideration was necessarily deferred, while the amount of annual revenue and expense seemed entirely undetermined. When the passage of the revenue laws, and of those which fixed the military and naval expenditure of the country, removed this objection, there was not time for a deliberate examination of the subject by Congress. Nor was it indeed important that any act in relation to a sinking fund should then be passed, since the revenue of the country could not be more effectually applied to the reduction of its debt than by paying the arrearages of military expense, and withdrawing from circulation the Treasury notes which the necessities of the Government had obliged it to issue. In the year 1816, the decrease of debt, as it appears upon the books of the Register of the Treasury, has been upwards of $10,872,000. But, to ascertain its true diminution, it is obvious that we must give credit to the Government for the payment of debts which did not appear upon the books of the Treasury, (such, for example as the arrears of the Army;) nor must we charge as a debt incurred in 1816 the stock which was issued in that year, in consideration of money advanced during the war. The issue of the stock did not change the amount of the debt, although it changed its character and its evidence. If these suggestions are correct, the true decrease of debt in the year 1816 cannot have been less than twenty-four millions of dollars, without including the means of further deduction which are afforded by the balance in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1817, of upwards of ten millions, exclusive of Treasury notes. It seems plain that no new legislative acts were necessary in the last session to accelerate the redemption of the public debt during the year 1816.

It is indeed a subject of pleasing reflection, that the revenue of two years has given to the Treasury a sum which is equal to four-fifths of the present amount of the entire debt, and which exceeds by fully seventeen millions, that proportion of it which is attributed to the late war. It will not however be forgotten, that this state of the revenue is transitory, as it was in some measure unexpected. So far too as it has resulted from an intemperate spirit of speculation, which has proportioned our supply of foreign articles neither to the demand nor the means of payment, it may have impaired the mercantile capital of the country, which is closely connected with its prosperity. Attribute what we may of this revenue, however, to chance or imprudence, it cannot fail to convince us that the means of the nation are adequate to the early redemption of its debt.

The debts indeed of no one war can be expected to reach an amount, to the discharge of which, within a reasonable time, the resources of the United States would be inadequate. It is by the accumulation of the debts of different wars, which in seasons of peace are allowed to be unreduced, or at least undischarged, that the system of borrowing grows to an enormity which exacts from a nation, as the annual interest of its debt, a proportion of its income greater than would have sufficed, at an early period, to have prevented or removed the encumbrance. The proposals in regard to the redemption of the public debt, which the Committee of Ways and Means suggest to the consideration of the House in the sequel of this report, so far as they depend upon a view of the probable revenue and expenditure of the country, are founded upon the estimates contained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. If his estimates of revenue be somewhat lower, and of expense higher than it may be supposed by many that some succeeding years will realize, it was probably prudent to guard his plans from the failure to which, in the unsettled state of our trade, and in some degree of our expenses, more sanguine calculations might have exposed them. The numerous and often incongruous provisions of the present laws in relation to the Sinking Fund require, in the opinion of the committee, a general revision. But their views upon this subject will be explained by the bill which accompanies this report; and they will confine their further remarks principally to some of its provisions, in which they propose to deviate from the plan recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The certain appropriation of ten millions annually, the committee do not propose to increase. While it is entirely within the means of the Treasury to discharge, it will probably be competent (with the aid which it will derive from the other provisions of the bill) to redeem the public debt, reduced, as it has been, by the payments of the last year, within a term nearly as short as has ever been contemplated for its extinguishment.

The large amount of revenue which accrued during the last year, enables Congress, in the opinion of the committee to apply so considerable a sum to the payment or purchase of public stock in 1817, as to increase, very sensibly, the effect of every subsequent year's appropriation, and materially to hasten the entire redemption of the public debt. They propose that, in addition to the permanent and regular annual appropriation, there should be paid, in the year 1817, to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, the sum of nine millions of dollars, together with four millions to be considered as an advance on account of the regular appropriation of the succeeding year. It is obvious that no advantage can arise from keeping in the Treasury a sum to be appropriated, at some future period, to the payment of the principal of a debt. Where it is applied to the payment of interest, or of the expenses of Government, the case is somewhat different; and the committee have, therefore, confined themselves to proposing an advance in 1817 of that part of the appropriation for 1818, which may be considered as applicable to the payment of the principal of the debt.

In addition to the annual appropriation of ten millions, it has been proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury to make, in each year, a further appropriation of one million, whenever it can be done, without reducing the balance in the Treasury, at the end of the year, below two millions. The committee admit that it may be prudent to apply only such part of the surplus in the Treasury as may be paid without reducing the balance below the sum which has been mentioned, but they think that whatever surplus, though it should exceed a million, can be applied without such reduction, should, also, be appropriated. The bill which they report provides that this shall be done, after the year 1817.

The advantage which may be derived from the last provision is too uncertain in amount to admit of calculation or of estimate. Such is not, however the character of the additional appropriation proposed to be made in 1817. This must diminish the interest to be paid for the next year by $760,000; in 1819, by $525,000; and in 1820, by $557,000, and will leave in the Treasury, (adopting the Secretary's estimates of revenue and expenditure,) on the 1st of January, 1818, $3,650,000; on the 1st of January, 1819, $1,400,000; and on the 1st of January, 1820, $1,150,000; after which, it is estimated, that the produce of the revenue, and, of course, the balances at the end of the year, will be increased.

In adding to the amount of the Sinking Fund, it appears to the committee not unworthy of the wisdom of the Legislature to simplify its operations. The documents subjoined to the last Treasury report show, that on the 1st of October last, there were nearly thirty-four millions of stock, of fourteen different descriptions, and carrying seven different rates of interest, standing on the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, on which interest is supposed regularly to accrue and to be paid, with no other effect than that of adding to the labors of those who keep and those who wish to understand the accounts of the Government. The committee propose that all certificates of public debt, when they are redeemed, shall be destroyed. It may be said to be hardly worth making a change in our law to produce no practical effect; and it is true, that in either mode, the diminution of national debt will be the same, but it is respectfully suggested, that, even if the trouble which it will save in making up the accounts be of no moment, it is of some consequence that their state should be such as to admit of being easily and generally understood, and that what is, in itself, plain, should not be obscured by the introduction of a useless fiction.

The committee report "A bill to provide for the redemption of the public debt," and, also, "A bill to repeal so much of any acts, now in force, as authorizes a loan of money or an issue of Treasury notes."

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill to repeal so much of any acts in force, as authorizes a loan of money or an issue of Treasury notes, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented a petition of the President and Board of Managers of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, praying that Congress will aid with the power, the patronage, and the resources of the country, the great and beneficial object of their institution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the President and Board of Managers of the "American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States," respectfully shows:—That your memorialists are delegated by a numerous and highly respectable association of their fellow-citizens, recently organized at the Seat of Government, to solicit Congress to aid with the power, the patronage, and the resources of the country, the great and beneficial object of their institution; an object deemed worthy of the earnest attention, and of the strenuous and persevering exertions, as well of every patriot, in whatever condition of life, as of every enlightened, philanthropic, and practical statesman.

It is now reduced to be a maxim equally approved in philosophy and practice, that the existence of distinct and separate castes, or classes, forming exceptions to the general system of polity adapted to the community, is an inherent vice in the composition of society; pregnant with baneful consequences, both moral and political, and demanding the utmost exertion of human energy and foresight to remedy or remove it. If this maxim be true in the general, it applies with peculiar force to the relative condition of the free people of color in the United States; between whom and the rest of the community, a combination of causes, political, physical, and moral, has created distinctions, unavoidable in their origin, and most unfortunate in their consequences. The actual and prospective condition of that class of people; their anomalous and indefinite relations to the political institutions and social ties of the community; their deprivation of most of those independent, political, and social rights, so indispensable to the progressive melioration of our nature; rendered, by systematic exclusion from all the higher rewards of excellence, dead to all the elevating hopes that might prompt a generous ambition to excel; all these considerations demonstrate, that it equally imports the public good, as the individual and social happiness of the persons more immediately concerned; that it is equally a debt of patriotism and of humanity to provide some adequate and effectual remedy. The evil has become so apparent, and the necessity for a remedy so palpable, that some of the most considerable of the slaveholding States have been induced to impose restraints upon the practice of emancipation, by annexing conditions, which have no effect but to transfer the evil from one State to another, or by inducing other States to adopt countervailing regulations, and in the total abrogation of a right which benevolent or conscientious proprietors had long enjoyed under all the sanctions of positive law and of ancient usage. Your memorialists beg leave, with all deference, to suggest that the fairest and most inviting opportunities are now presented to the General Government for repairing a great evil in our social and political institutions, and, at the same time, for elevating, from a low and hopeless condition, a numerous and rapidly increasing race of men, who want nothing but a proper theatre, to enter upon the pursuit of happiness and independence, in the ordinary paths which a benign Providence has left open to the human race. Those great ends, it is conceived, may be accomplished by making adequate provision for planting, in some salubrious and fertile region, a colony, to be composed of such of the above description of persons as may choose to emigrate; and for extending to it the authority and protection of the United States, until it shall have attained sufficient strength and consistency to be left in a state of independence.

Independently of the motives derived from political foresight and civil prudence, on the one hand, and from moral justice and philanthropy on the other, there are additional considerations and more expanded views to engage the sympathies and excite the ardor of a liberal and enlightened people. It may be reserved for our Government (the first to denounce an inhuman and abominable traffic in the guilt and disgrace of which most of the civilized nations of the world were partakers) to become the honorable instrument, under Divine Providence, of conferring a still higher blessing upon the large and interesting portion of mankind, benefitted by that deed of justice; by demonstrating that a race of men, composing numerous tribes, spread over a continent of vast and unexplored extent, fertility, and riches; known to the enlightened nations of antiquity; and who had yet made no progress in the refinements of civilization; for whom history has preserved no monuments of arts or arms; that even this hitherto, ill-fated race, may cherish the hope of beholding at last the orient star revealing the best and highest aims and attributes of man. Out of such materials, to rear the glorious edifice of well ordered and polished society, upon the deep and sure foundations of equal laws and diffusive education, would give a sufficient title to be enrolled among the illustrious benefactors of mankind, while it afforded a precious and consolatory evidence of the all-prevailing power of liberty, enlightened by knowledge and corrected by religion. If the experiment, in its remote consequences, should ultimately tend to the diffusion of similar blessings through those vast regions and unnumbered tribes, yet obscured in primeval darkness; reclaim the rude wanderer from a life of wretchedness to civilization and humanity; and convert the blind idolator from gross and abject superstitions to the holy charities, the sublime morality, and humanizing discipline of the Gospel; the nation, or the individual, that shall have taken the most conspicuous lead in achieving the benignant enterprise, will have raised a monument of that true and imperishable glory, founded in the moral approbation and gratitude of the human race—unapproachable to all but the elected instruments of divine beneficence—a glory, with which the most splendid achievements of human force or power must sink in the competition, and appear insignificant and vulgar in the comparison. And, above all, should it be considered that the nation or the individual, whose energies have been faithfully given to this august work, will have secured, by this exalted beneficence, the favor of that Being, “whose compassion is over all his works,” and whose unspeakable rewards will never fail to bless the humblest effort to do good to his creatures.

Your memorialists do not presume to determine that the views of Congress will be necessarily directed to the country to which they have just alluded. They hope to be excused for intimating some of the reasons which would bring that portion of the world before us, when engaged in discovering a place the most proper to be selected, leaving it, with perfect confidence, to the better information and better judgment of your honorable body to make the choice.

Your memorialists, without presuming to mark out, in detail, the measures which it may be proper to adopt in the furtherance of the object in view; but implicitly relying upon the wisdom of Congress to devise the most effectual measures, will only pray that the subject may be recommended to their serious consideration; and that, as an humble auxiliary in this great work, the association, represented by your memorialists, may be permitted to aspire to the hope of contributing its labors and resources.

B. WASHINGTON, President.

COMPENSATION LAW.

The House proceeded to the order of the day on the bill to repeal the Compensation Law, so called, and substitute therefor a per diem allowance; and the bill having been read in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that, in moving, as he now did, to fill the blank (for the amount of future daily compensation) with eight dollars, he obeyed the instructions of the committee who reported this bill, of which he was a member. There had been in the committee a diversity of opinion on this subject, one or two gentlemen preferring nine or ten, and a bare majority consenting to eight. Although he did not differ from the committee in the reasonings of their report, he could not feel it his duty to come to the same result as to the future compensation, as a majority of the committee had done. He should, he said, vote against the repeal of the present compensation taking a retrospective operation; he wished the repeal to take place on the fourth day of March next, and leave it to the next Congress, four-fifths of whom were elected to regulate this matter, the right of fixing it. He was desirous, he said, to give them a responsibility which he presumed they would be proud to assume, and should vote against adding at this time a single cent to the old compensation of six dollars per day. Mr. J. expressed his hope, as he had endeavored, in previously discussing the subject, to avoid on a question of this delicacy saying anything in any manner to wound the feelings of the members, that perfect harmony would characterize the whole debate. He believed, he said, that no member of this House, regarding the members as pensioners merely, with a view to pecuniary considerations only, could say that $1,500 was too great a compensation, nor even that it was enough. But, Mr. J. said, his judgment and conscience dictated to him in obedience to the public will, to vote to repeal the law, and leave the compensation as it was previous to the passage of the reprobated compensation law.

Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania, next rose to speak on the subject. His rising occasioned a deviation from the usual order of the House, by the members crowding round him, which may be attributed to the general respect for his years, experience, and intelligence.

After making some general observations on the nature of this subject, Mr. F. gave a concise history of what had been formerly done, respecting the compensation of members of Congress. He stated that, under the Confederation, each State paid its own members, and instructed and recalled them at pleasure; that, when Congress money gave way to specie, some States paid eight dollars a day, some more, and some less. Pennsylvania paid six dollars, but had great difficulty to procure members willing to serve. Some small States gave but four, and were rarely ever represented. It must be well known to those who remember that period, and paid attention to it, that nine States out of the thirteen, were a quorum necessary to make requisitions on the States and other important business, and that this number could with difficulty be got together one month in a year.

When the National Government was organized, the committee of the Representatives to whom the compensation of the members was referred, took an average of what the States themselves had paid their members, and it was either six dollars, and one-third or two-thirds, which, is now forgot. They reported, however, six dollars a day for the Representatives, but limited it to a time after the census would be taken, and a more equal representation would take place; when that time came, about twenty years ago, the subject was again referred to a committee. A salary was proposed and advocated, but believing it was contrary to public opinion, or at least the common practice in paying the State Legislatures, this was dropped, and a compensation of eight dollars a day reported; after a discussion this was rejected by one, or at most two votes.

There had about this time been a considerable rise of expense, and several State Legislatures had increased their compensation, yet Congress, believing that this arose from temporary causes, increased the compensation of clerks and some subordinate officers, and of the Heads of Departments, for a limited time, which, however, has been renewed. When the eight dollars was rejected, some members openly declared their intention to decline, and actually did so.

Mr. F. said, that to members, whose farms supported their families, and who did not bring their families with them, the six dollars a day would still pay their expenses; but to such as have to support their families by their industry in any occupation it would not do. Several members, to his own knowledge, had tried it a few sessions, sending the half of their wages monthly to support their families, but had to decline. It was well known that members preferred almost any offices in the gift of the United States, as well as of their own State, to a seat in Congress; and it is evident that, for want of the attendance of members, the most important measures were frequently transacted in a thin house, which certainly ought not to be the case.

He observed that, agreeably to the principles of our Government, all classes, and all interests, ought to be represented in Congress. He knew that the wages might be made so low, that but one class, viz: the wealthy, who could afford the expense, and did not depend on their own personal industry, would serve. But this would change the nature of the Government. But even if the compensation was raised, or the salary established, there would always be many who would not serve, many to whom no wages we ought to give would compensate their loss, and there are many whom no compensation we could give would induce to leave their endearing families, comforts, and cares, to serve at such a distance from home as many of the members have to do. Some who have done so, always reflect on it with deep regret.

Mr. F. said, as this was the last session he ever would serve, his voting for an increase of the daily wages, as he designed to do, could contribute very little to his advantage, when it was known that, though he was not here last session, to vote either for or against the compensation law, being prevented by sickness, he was yet entitled to receive the compensation, but would not claim nor would he receive it; therefore expected that voting for an increase of wages would not be imputed to him as the result of self-interest. He would not vote for the repeal of the salary, because he thought it contrary to the Constitution or any principle of the Government, but because he thought it inexpedient. On the whole, Mr. F. said, that he wished to leave those who succeeded him on a footing equal to what he was himself when he came into Congress. He wished a reasonable compensation to be fixed, to continue until after the next census; not but what he knew every Congress had equal power as the first Congress had, to fix their own compensation. All the State Legislatures have done so, some of them oftener than once. He would vote to fill the blank with eight dollars; not because he thought it equal to six when he went first into Congress, but because he thought, when the currency was regulated to a specie standard, which he hoped would be the case before the next Congress, it would be equal. This was no new thought of his. He, agreeably to his own opinion of the public good, had determined to vote for a moderate increase of wages before he left Congress; for obvious reasons such a question had been delayed until long after the State Legislatures had set the example.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, then took the floor. The auction of popularity, he said, differed in one material respect from all others: the first bidder standing in the same relation to the transaction as the last bidder does at other auctions. Hence it could be no cause of surprise, that at all times, where any measure within the scope of public contemplation should be peculiarly odious, a great anxiety should be manifested as to who should be foremost in the repeal; or otherwise, if the measure was entirely desirable, the same struggle should take place in the race who should be first to reach the goal. He for one, had been extremely glad that the House of Representatives had, on this occasion, so far at least, not been wanting in a sense of decent self-respect. He hoped the Committee would not understand him to intend to enter into the merits of the bill, or to commit himself to the support of it on its final passage; but he had no hesitation in saying, if it was to pass, that it ought not to pass in the shape in which it had been offered by the committee. What urgency was there in this case? Would any honorable member show him that there was a great urgency that the act of the last session should be repealed as to the remaining part of this session, and that the law should be further modified by an increase of the compensation thirty-three and a third per cent? This body ought not to act on any frivolous impulse; it ought not to act on any temporary excitement. He hoped not to be misunderstood. The people of the United States are the sovereigns of the United States; the Government is theirs, because the soil is theirs—the country is theirs; they have a right to be heard. But what, said he, have we heard from the public on this occasion, except a solitary petition this morning from some part of Pennsylvania for a repeal of the law? Now, with all due respect for public opinion, where is the necessity for the passage of the bill on the table? If this House, said he, is to act on this subject; if it is to undo or patch up the act of the last session; if this House is to offer something like a tub to the great Leviathan of popularity, what ought they to do? To undo all they have done, or to do nothing. In what predicament shall we present ourselves to our constituents?—going on the principle that these constituents are hostile to the law. Thank God mine have said nothing to me about it; no, sir, I do not think mine will say anything to me on that score. What shall we say to the people, who have been clamoring about it, when they are told that we have repealed the act, and taken the difference of thirty-three and a third per cent. more than we should if we had never passed it? I would not wish to stand in a more pitiable, I would add pitiful, condition before the people, than with this bill in my hand as amendatory of the act of the last session.

Without now giving an opinion of the merits of the bill, reserving himself until the bill should be more fully before the House, he rose to offer an amendment which he believed would supersede the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky. Take notice, said he, I do not pledge myself to vote for the bill, even if my amendment be adopted. I do not wish to entrap the House, but to show what, in my opinion, ought to be done, if we move in the question at all. Mr. R. then proposed to strike out the whole bill, and insert in lieu thereof, a provision to repeal entirely the law of last session, and require a deduction from the amount of pay received by the members of so much as, during the past and present sessions, they shall have received over and above the rate of six dollars per day. The act of the last session was retrospective and retroactive in its operation; and if the House touched the law at this session, in his opinion they ought to take up the matter where they did at the last session, and any law now passed should be retroactive in the same manner as the act passed at the last session. It perhaps might be remembered by the Chair, or perhaps the Chairman might not have thought it worth while to remember, that at the last session, he (Mr. R.) had made a motion, limiting the operation of the law to a future Congress; and that that motion, on the argument of other gentlemen, he had seen fit to withdraw—and he had so thought for this reason, that each Congress ought to take upon itself the responsibility of assessing its own pay; that to do so was a duty devolving on it, from which it had no right to shrink. If they had now assessed it too high in their own opinions, they ought to refund the surplus.

The CHAIRMAN having declared that Mr. RANDOLPH's motion did not supersede that of Mr. JOHNSON—

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he was not in the situation of the man who had been so long remembered that he was forgot; but he had been so long a member of the House as to have lost all knowledge of its rules and orders of proceeding. The rule with which he had been acquainted for near fourteen years, in this House, was, that the motion to strike out the section of a bill superseded a motion to amend it. He wished to know, if not now in order, when it would be in order to propound his motion to the House.

The SPEAKER explained the change of practice in late years in the House, whereby it was established, that a bill should be open for any amendments, to be made as perfect as it could, before a motion was entertained to strike out the first section.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, said this subject was one so practical, so familiar to every one by the discussions it had undergone, that it was not worth while to detain the House with any remarks in support of the proposition which he now submitted, to fix the compensation for the future at the old standard of six dollars per day.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he was in favor of retaining the salary feature, because he thought it most consistent with the public interest. But if that law must be repealed, one great objection to that course would be removed by the adoption of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Virginia. If touched at all, said he, it should be in such a manner as not to brand our names and that of the Congress to which we belong, to the latest ages, with dishonor and disgrace. I would not put into my pocket that compensation which I believe to be right, and refuse it to our successors, or put into my pocket what I believe unjust, and keep it there. For the purpose, therefore, of removing this great and prominent difficulty in his mind, he should move to fill the blank with "ten" dollars—not that he should, if his motion succeeded, vote for this bill, because in the abstract he preferred a salary. He would make the mileage different, however, and at a less rate than that. Mr. G. disclaimed any intention, at this time, to enter into the general question, reserving himself for a future opportunity.

Mr. T. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, intimated his wish so to amend the bill as that the law should remain as it is until the 4th of March next, and that it should then be divested of its objectionable salary feature.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee, intimated his wish, if the gentleman from Virginia was serious in his refunding system, that he would be good enough to make the day of refunding some convenient time after the close of the session, to give gentlemen an opportunity to obtain the means of complying with that provision. [This suggestion produced no little mirth in the House.] Mr. R. said he was not for coming down at once to six dollars per day, but was for fixing on that daily sum, which would amount as nearly as might be to fifteen hundred dollars for the whole time of sitting during a year. He would inform the gentleman from Virginia, he said, that, if in his remarks on that head, he had alluded to the committee who reported this bill, they had nothing to do with the rapid race of popularity which the honorable gentleman had so handsomely described. He would only add, that he believed the honorable gentleman himself had now announced a motion, which had more substantial popularity in it than all the other motions on the subject put together.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, said, there were four propositions before the Committee for filling the blank in the bill—ten, nine, eight, and six dollars. He had seconded the motion to fill the blank with six dollars, and he should vote against every proposition till it came down to six dollars, which he should support, because he thought we ought to retrace our steps, and place the pay of the members on its former footing, at six dollars per day. A gentleman had said that he would not be moved by the public voice on this occasion. Mr. D. said he thought he possessed as much independence as most men, but he confessed that he was not so independent as to disregard public opinion. Ours is a Government of the people; the people are virtually the governors, and we, as their agents, are bound to act up to their will, when that can be ascertained; and can any gentleman doubt that the will of the people is against the compensation law? It has not only been disapproved, but reprobated, from one end of the continent to the other, in a few places excepted, where extravagance is the order of the day, and among a few individuals in other places, who consider themselves exclusively entitled to all offices of prominence, and who look forward with expectation of filling the situation, when a fat salary would be quite welcome. It is my opinion, that the people had not only a right to complain, but had ample cause of complaint. We had but recently got out of a necessary, but an expensive war. I won't say the people were oppressed, but I will say that they were pretty heavily burdened with taxes, and I have no hesitation in saying that they would have borne double, yes, treble, as much, if they could have been convinced that it was necessary in defence of their rights; but when they discovered (as they believed) that the adoption of the compensation law was aggrandizing ourselves, and laying additional burdens on them, was it any wonder they complained? Although I have no doubt but what the agitation in the public mind, was, in some instances, carried to extremes, yet the opposition to what they conceived an encroachment, was a favorable symptom; for while ever this feeling in the public mind is alive, liberty is safe. The people will correct any errors that may be gone into by their agents.

Mr. D. said, this was an unpleasant subject to touch upon, and what made it rather embarrassing to him, was the knowledge that he was speaking against the feelings and inclinations of a majority of the House, and, at the same time, recollecting the pointed and severe sarcasms and ridicule attempted to be attached to all those who were opposed to the compensation bill, last session, and particularly to those who got an opportunity of speaking against the measure. But where duty impelled, he trusted he should never be found wanting; that he should not interfere with motives, and should be cautious not to make use of expressions calculated to wound feelings, and he hoped he should be treated with a correspondent liberality, as he should be very careful of his own feelings. Mr. D. said he rejoiced when his honorable colleague brought forward the resolution on which this bill is bottomed, because he thought it came better from him than it could have come from any other member, as he brought forward the measure which this bill contemplates modifying or repealing; but the gentleman's speech accompanying the resolution was of a character well calculated to defeat the purport of the resolution. It was calculated to rivet on the minds of the original advocates of the measure, that the law giving the salary to members of Congress was just and correct, and ought not to be repealed. The gentleman told you that what influenced him in the introduction of the resolution, was, that he discovered that the compensation law was disapproved of by the people; and as he was always willing to act consistently with the will of the people, and subscribed to the principle of instruction, he therefore felt it his duty to introduce the resolution, and should vote for the repeal of the compensation law. This, to be sure, could not be collected from the tenor of the gentleman's speech, but the gentleman told us so, and his word is always good. To harbor a thought that any other motives than the purest kind actuate my colleague in his public conduct, would be doing him injustice; and he certainly is entitled to considerable credit for willingly attending to the wishes of the people, and subscribing to the principle of instruction, which I view as the very essence of representative government. To deny that the people have a right to instruct their agents, is striking at the very nature of our Government. I have been often gratified with the open, gentlemanly, and candid manner my colleague treats questions in debate; but I confess that on that occasion I should have been perfectly satisfied with the bare resolution, unaccompanied by the speech, as I viewed the remarks (although they were delivered with considerable eloquence) as in direct hostility to the object expressed in the resolution.

The gentleman contrasted the present pay of the members of Congress, with the pay of a number of the officers of Government, commencing with the President of the United States, and coming down to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper. I will appeal to my honorable colleague's candor, to say whether this kind of argument was altogether so fair, or, if fair, was it applicable on the present occasion, unless money is made the first consideration, as in the combined report of the committee who produced this bill?—in which report, notwithstanding it is ably drawn, there is scarcely a patriotic sentence from the commencement to the end. Money, money, is the burden of the song. I venture to say, when the people of this country generally adopt such principles, by making money the first consideration, to the exclusion of patriotic feelings, that your liberty will be on the decline, and will soon be gone. But to return to the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper. These men are not only useful, but excellent officers, and I confess I wish to see them in their present places, while ever I am honored with a seat in this House. But can any gentleman suppose they would accept the situations they now fill for the honor attached to them? Certainly not. Emolument must be the only consideration that can induce them to wish the places—and ought that to be the case with a gentleman who represents thirty-five thousand free people? Most unquestionably not. I view the situation of a man who is honored with a seat on this floor, as one of the most important, if not the most honorable, situations under the Government. It is true, there are higher situations, but they are not immediately in the gift of the people; they are placed one or two removes from the people, but we are the immediate representatives of thirty-five thousand free people. What can be more honorable? And is it fair to contrast such situations with places that have only pecuniary reward, as an inducement to acceptance? It appears to me that it is not. I say that the honor of serving freemen on this floor, ought to be the first consideration, and not pecuniary reward.

Mr. D. said, whenever the salaries of legislators were raised so high as to give a spring to extravagance, by making money the first consideration, you give at once a vital stab to patriotism. Patriotism will sink under sordid avarice, the precursor of the downfall of Republics. The first consideration of wise Legislatures, in free Governments, is, if they wish to perpetuate liberty, and their happy institutions, to frame their laws and public regulations so as to guard particularly against extravagance and luxury. Was not extravagance and luxury the groundwork of the overthrow of nearly if not quite all the ancient Republics? And is it not a fair way of reasoning, to judge of the future from the past? At least it will be acknowledged, that what has happened may happen again. Then, I say, it is prudent to guard against what may at first appear trivial, but what may, and certainly what will, operate as an entering wedge, and ultimately, from the nature of things, be the means of the overthrow of the only Republic in the world. Then is it not wise policy to frame your regulations so as to guard against this cankered worm, this fatal enemy to free Governments, extravagance and luxury? Whenever it commences at the fountain head, the whole stream must become polluted; when it commences with your heads of Governments, with the highest legislators, and officers of Government, it will ramify, and spread its destructive venom throughout all orders of society, until the prostration of our free institutions will be the inevitable consequence.

But more particularly to the point—is fifteen hundred dollars too much for a member of Congress to receive for his service, taking into consideration the expenses he must necessarily incur here? But this question will depend on circumstances—it will depend on what equipage he has, and the number of family he brings with him. If a member brings his family with him, keeps waiters, has a carriage and horses, he may expend large sums of money; but are these necessary appendages to legislation? I conceive not. I consider the man who is always at his post, and is attentive to his duty, of more consequence to the public, than the man who sports away his time, and expends his money on vain show and empty parade. Mr. D. said, he held it correct, that every officer of Government ought to have an ample compensation for services. He ought not to be compelled, from the scantiness of his pay, to live parsimoniously; but still he ought to pay some respect to economy. My opinion is, that six dollars per day will enable a member to live genteelly, and lay up some money; and I admit he ought to lay up some money, but not so much as to make it the first inducement to acceptance of office. Let us examine this subject a little, and see how it stands. The sessions of Congress, we may fairly conclude, will average about five months in every year, one hundred and fifty days; and what will be the probable expense of a member living here? We will say the average boarding is twelve or thirteen dollars per week, keeping his horse, four and a half or five dollars per week, which will make about seventeen dollars per week for boarding and horse keeping, and which will amount, in an ordinary session of five months, to about three hundred and seventy or eighty dollars; add to this, two hundred dollars for clothing, drink, and contingent expenses, which will amount to about five hundred and seventy or eighty dollars. The pay of a member, at six dollars per day, for a session of five months, would be nine hundred dollars. A member gets six dollars for every twenty miles in travelling to, and returning from, this place. Say the average distance of the members' places of residence from the Seat of Government, is about four hundred miles, which would amount to two hundred and forty dollars; one-half of this he would expend in travelling, and live genteelly, and the other half add to his per diem allowance, and it would make one thousand and twenty dollars, from which deduct the five hundred and seventy or eighty dollars, and the residue will be found to be about four hundred and forty or fifty dollars. This four hundred and forty or fifty dollars is certainly not an object sufficient to induce a man to come here, if his view is to make money; but if a man calculates on being remunerated for privations consequent on absence from family, he will be mistaken. Money could not compensate him for such privations—they are necessarily interwoven in the nature of our Government, and must be submitted to, or a fatal stroke is made at the strength of our Government, which will operate as a damper to all patriotism, and sow the seeds of avarice, the bane of civil liberty, or produce extravagance and luxury, the introduction of which is destructive to those Governments whose base or strength is virtue and economy.

Mr. D. said, he should vote for filling up the blank with no sum but six dollars; he was opposed to the compensation bill when it was adopted; he still thought it wrong, and was in favor of placing the pay of members on their former footing, and also for the repealing law taking effect from the commencement of this session, or, if gentlemen please, from the termination of last. One word as to an expression made use of by a gentleman, which was, that a few months ago, after a long discussion and mature deliberation, we passed this law.

Mr. Chairman, what is the fact? The bill was introduced on the 6th of March, read the first and second time agreeably to rule, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for the seventh. On the seventh, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill in the after part of the day. The bill was under discussion in the Committee about three or four hours, when the Committee rose, reported the bill, and ordered it to be engrossed for a third reading on the eighth, and on the eighth the bill passed the House of Representatives; only one day intervened between the day of its introduction, and the day it passed and left the House.

In the few remarks I have submitted, I have cautiously avoided personalities, or any expressions calculated to wound the feelings of gentlemen, and trust that a correspondent liberality will be measured out to me.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, proposed to strike out the first section of the bill, at once, to effect its rejection—to ascertain, without circumlocution, whether the House seriously meant to undo at this session what they had done at the last.

Being informed by the Chairman that such a motion was not now in order, Mr. R. expressed his regret that it was not, as he was desirous to show, that he at least would adhere to opinions deliberately formed. He agreed to the position that the public voice, correctly understood, ought to be obeyed. What public voice, then, said he, am I to obey? That of my own constituents. The only remark, Mr. R. said, that he thought proper to make on this question at the last session, was, that the vote which he should give would be known to his constituents before his election. That vote had been before them, and no objection had been made to it. The voice of his constituents, therefore, Mr. R. said, did not require him to vote for the repeal of a law to which they had no objection.

He confessed, he said, that his principal object, at the last session, was to place the members in the same relative situation, as to compensation, as other officers of the Government; that this House should not be considered as the mere avenue to Executive appointments—in a word, that the nation should be represented in this House by the talents and character which ought to belong to it. This branch of the Government, the Legislature, was placed first in the Constitution and in the spirit of the Government, but had become last in the administration of it. First principles, he said, ought to be adhered to, and that place which Congress holds under the Constitution it ought to hold in the administration of the Government. Looking back to the history of the Government, how few of those who had the honor of a seat on this floor, distinguished by talent, had remained here? They had either gone home to support their families, or had gone over to the Executive. Whatever might be said here in contempt of money, offices are more sought after, and if not more honorable are more honored, as they are more or less lucrative. Devoted as I am to the democratic branch of the Government, said Mr. R., I wish to place it in such a situation as to hold as well as receive its due proportion of talent. Hitherto very few, perhaps none, had considered the service of the people in this House as one to which they could devote themselves. Mr. R. asked, whether it was proper that in this Government a servant of the people should be better served than the people themselves, or be cherished more than their immediate Representatives, more than the branch more essential than any other to the preservation of our liberties.

Mr. R. said he was disposed to leave the act of the last session untouched. He did not, he said, wish to go before the people of the United States higgling and disputing between six, seven, eight, or nine dollars a day. He hoped the act of the last session would receive the sanction of a second vote in this House.

As regards the instructions of the people, Mr. R. said he would go as far as any gentleman in his obedience to them. If he were fairly instructed by his constituents to give a vote on any question of expediency, he would give the vote required, or retire from their service. With regard to any question involving the Constitution, he did not acknowledge his obligation to obey instructions, but, if he had an opportunity, he would even in that case retire, and give them an opportunity to choose one who would. Was this public opinion to be found in the clamors at cross-roads and popular meetings? There was a mode, he said, in which public opinion could be expressed to this House, and the people knew the mode. Mr. R. said he did not feel himself bound to regard as public opinion the statements of the newspapers, nor as expressions of public opinion the resolutions of court-house meetings. What, he asked, was the duty of a Representative on this floor? To think and express his own sentiments, openly, fairly, and explicitly. If a man believes his opinions correct, he ought to adhere to them; if they are good, they are valuable to the nation; if bad, they will be harmless; for, being known, he will be deprived of his political existence. Above all, said Mr. R., we owe it to the people, we owe it to ourselves, to let them know what we are; we owe it to them not to shift or vary our course, to catch the popular opinion, and thus to serve our own views at the expense of our conviction of what is true, and what the public interests require.

Mr. R. said he would not enter into the discussion about the competency of six, seven, eight, or ten dollars to the maintenance of a member. The amount, he said, was a sort of bed of Procrustes, to which we might accommodate ourselves without pain, by curtailment or expansion, so as to suit its dimensions. We might live on the former allowance—we should not become rich by the present. This was a point, he said, of little importance to him in a pecuniary point of view, and he presumed any gentleman in the House might make with truth the same declaration; his only motive for voting for the act was to place the members of this House on something like an equality with other departments of the Government. He should, he said, vote against any proposed modification of the law of the last session, going to reduce the amount of compensation; for it was in vain for gentlemen to talk about honor as an inducement to serve here, when it has not been sufficient to induce members to remain in this House, when Executive appointments were offered to them. If the act were repealed, he cared not what modification took place; if he thought it his duty to vote for the repeal, and his circumstances would permit it, he should certainly feel himself bound to refund what he had received, under the act, beyond the rate of six dollars per day; but voting against any repeal or modification of the law, he should not feel himself bound to vote for that proposition.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) next addressed the Chair. For one, he confessed he had been greatly gratified at the self-respect which the House had manifested in the course this subject had received. He did think, he said, that at the commencement of the session, he would not say an improper but an unnecessary degree of zeal had been displayed in taking up this subject; and he had been highly gratified in finding that the House had determined that the subject should take that dispassionate course which belonged to its character.

He did not agree, he said, with gentlemen, several of whom had expressed an opinion on this occasion and on a former, that the dissatisfaction expressed through the country in regard to this law, was to be attributed wholly to faction, to demagogues, or designing men. Some of it perhaps might; but when we find, in all parts of the country, even in those having no intercourse with each other, a general dissatisfaction, we are bound to conceive that the people are really opposed to the measure.

Mr. C. said he agreed perfectly in the sentiment, that instructions given by the people are obligatory on the Representatives. This was a principle consecrated by the Revolution, inseparable from all free Government, and which he therefore hoped never to see departed from in practice under ours. It was indeed like all other general principles, regulated by certain limitations. An instruction to violate the Constitution, for instance, is not binding. Why? Because the expression of the will of the people in the Constitution is paramount to the expression of their will in the form of instructions, and because the Representative is sworn to obey that paramount will. But on questions of expediency, the will of the people ought to be binding; and if there was a question more than any other in regard to which the popular will should be obeyed, it is that in which the Representatives are called upon to fix their own compensation; in which they are a party on one side, and the people on the other. Every consideration of propriety and delicacy, as well as of principle, required that where the opinion of the constituent in regard to compensation is decidedly expressed, it is to be received as conclusive and implicitly obeyed. Whilst, then, he had a seat on this floor, Mr. C. said, it was immaterial how he arrived at the will of his constituents, or what were the evidences of it, it was sufficient that he should know it; in all cases of expediency he held the doctrine of an obligation on his part to observe the instructions, express or implied, of his constituents. Cases might possibly arise in which he should not feel himself bound by instructions to deviate from the course which he conceived to be correct—where, for example, important facts existed, materially varying the case, of which his constituents had been ignorant. In such a case he might throw himself on the liberality and justice of the people to determine, under the whole circumstances, whether he had acted correctly or not. What is the will of the people of his particular district of his constituents, ought, on this subject, to be the question for every member. The people, Mr. C. said, whom he had the honor to represent, were—he hoped he should not be accused of arrogance in saying so—a people high-minded, independent, jealous of their honor and their liberty, but at the same time liberal and just; and so also he doubted not were all the people of the United States. In regard to that district, he believed that the people would be satisfied with any liberal compensation to the members of Congress, that should not be extravagant in its amount. He believed they would be satisfied, if the compensation should be fixed at ten, eleven, or twelve dollars per day. At the last session, Mr. C. said, he had stated his preference for a daily compensation over a fixed salary or gross amount per session, but that the reasons urged in favor of the latter mode were so plausible, if not convincing, as to be sufficient to warrant the experiment of that plan which, if found unsatisfactory or inexpedient, it would be always in the power of Congress to repeal. In advocating the return from a salary to a daily, but increased compensation, at the same time that he conformed to the will of his constituents, he did not vary the grounds on which he had acted at the last session.

The idea of the salary mode of compensation being so alarming in its consequences as had been described, was, Mr. C. said, a very novel one. All who recollected the debates in the conventions on the Constitution—in that of Virginia, for instance—would remember that all parties had treated the clause respecting the compensation of members of Congress, as contemplating a salary, using that identical phrase. Patrick Henry, speaking of a salary, hoped that the members would not fix their salary at an unreasonable rate. Mr. Grayson and the late Governor Tyler took the other side, and said their fears were that Congress would fix it at so low a rate that only the wealthy would be able to defray the expense of attending Congress, the effect of which would be to lead this Government to a species of oligarchy. Notwithstanding, however, that the idea of the power of Congress, as they deemed expedient, to fix their compensation in one or the other form having been coeval with the instrument under which they act, Mr. C. said he preferred a daily compensation, because it was more simple, more conformable to the usages of the States, besides being more equal and more just in its operation in regard to the members at different times. For although, if we take a series of years, the result, as it respects the public, will be the same under the one mode and under the other, as it regards the members serving in that series, the result will be unequal, the member serving in a Congress whose sessions are of long duration, receiving no more than him who serves in a Congress whose sessions are of short duration. There was in fact no way to make the compensation perfectly equal, but to make it daily.

Compensation Law.

H OF R.

It became this House, on the present occasion, Mr. C. said, to deliberate, to act calmly and considerately. He would not, he said, examine the causes of dissatisfaction from Maine to Georgia, from the shores of the Atlantic to the remotest west; whether it had arisen from misconstruction of the act, from want of information as to the considerations which made it expedient, &c. In relation to his own district, he had great pleasure in stating what had been the fact. When I went home, said he, I do not recollect having met with one solitary individual of any description of party who was not opposed to the act, who did not on some ground or other think it an improper and unjust law. But after it had been discussed and examined with all its lights, I did not find (as far as I recollect) a solitary individual who did not admit that the augmentation of the compensation of the members was a just and proper measure. The result of all that I heard was a conviction on my mind that the people remain dissatisfied with the form, but that ninety-nine out of an hundred are satisfied that there ought to be an augmentation of the compensation of the members, proportionate to the depreciation of money, or, what is the same thing, to the increase in the price of commodities since 1789. For his part, then, Mr. C. said, he had a disposition to do justice to the members as well as to the people. If the compensation were reduced so low as that none but opulent men could aspire to seats in this House, the evil predicted by the fathers of the Constitution would be realized; and all the middling class of society, that in which the weight of talents is to be found in this country, would be banished from the legislative councils.

Mr. C. said, that under such impressions, he should vote for a higher compensation than six dollars per day. He felt indifferent whether it should be now fixed at eight, nine, or ten dollars; confident whichever sum should be agreed to, that not only the people of the district which he represented would approve, but that the whole American people would sanction the measure by their approbation. He differed from an honorable gentleman from New York with regard to an increase of the mileage. He thought that also ought to be increased, for, he asked, who makes the greatest sacrifice in coming here? The members from the greatest distance certainly. If, then, the mileage be increased in the same ratio with the daily pay, the greatest benefit will be bestowed where there is the greatest burden.

Mr. C. concluded by saying, he did not think this a very important question, and he should not therefore longer detain the attention of the Committee. He had thought himself bound to assign the reasons for the vote he should give, and should vote with cheerfulness for the sum proposed by the Committee, or for a higher.

Mr. RANDOLPH, understanding the whole merits of the bill to be before the House on the present question, which he had not before understood to be the case, proceeded to deliver his views of it.

This question, he said, had assumed a character, had put on an appearance and quality, which did not belong to it. As such, he for one was willing to strip it of its borrowed plumes. That, if a sentiment exist in the public mind, it is immaterial in what manner manifested, it is entitled to weight, he agreed; but he was not prepared either to affirm or deny that the sentiment which the gentleman had said pervaded the whole continent, was the ruling sentiment. In what manner had it been excited? The honorable member had said that in all parts of the country, however disconnected with one another, there existed but one opinion in relation to the law. This country, said Mr. R., is or was but lately divided into two great parties, which possessed complete and efficient control over the press. No sooner did the law of the last session pass, than both parties started in the race of popularity to run down that law. To this fact must be attributed the general sentiment of indignation which had been referred to. He held in his hand, he said, an authority on the state and condition of England—and here we had proceeded pari passu—that by means of the press the sentiment which exists in the heart of the body politic is propagated and diffused to its remotest extremities. In this way the present public indignation, if it did exist, had been excited. Gentlemen, Mr. R. said, had spoken of their districts; he would speak of his. It had been for some time past a sort of ward in chancery, and every constituted authority, from the President of the United States to the printer's devil, had had it in his especial care; and yet, he was bold to say, that in that district such a sentiment as the Speaker represented to prevail throughout the United States, did not exist. To the cause he had mentioned, was to be attributed (disgraceful fact!) the public excitement which was represented to exist. The people of the United States, Mr. R. said, were, as they had been represented to be, a virtuous, high-minded people. They had borne, and would ever continue to bear, burdens and privations of the most enormous and distressing kind, so as they were convinced, rightly or not, that the public weal required them. They had borne the embargo; they had borne the miserable non-importation system; they had borne a long, bloody, destructive, and in some respects disastrous war; they had borne with mismanagement in the camp and in the Senate, and they would ever bear with it, so long as they believe that the intentions of those clothed with power have been honest and good.

But we are told, said Mr. R., that this is a matter of money; that the whole report of the select committee on the subject, is about money. And about what did the committee report? The subject-matter of their report was money, and what other subject should they have spoken of? Would the gentleman have had them talk of fortifications, of military and naval defence, of roads and canals, or of the National University? I have, said Mr. R., a much more serious fault than that to find with this report—that the last member of the syllogism is in direct contradiction to the major and minor. It is true, Mr. R. said, (referring probably to the absence of Mr. WEBSTER, the reputed author of that report,) that those men who come from the greatest distance to Congress suffer most. What, he asked, was the situation of the men whom we follow to their long and dreary abode, in this place, because intelligence cannot reach their abodes in time to draw their friends around them before their death? That we are bound to hold the opinions of the people in high respect, said Mr. R., I agree; but there are some subjects on which we are better qualified to give than to receive instruction. Any man, who has had experience of public life in this place, is better able to say what is a reasonable compensation than any man who has not been here; and, when I talk of reasonable compensation, do I mean to say there is any assignable relation between services on this floor and money? None, there is none. No sum of mere money, taking it for granted the party is separated from his wife or children—ignorant of each other's situation, when one, or both, or all, may be struggling in the agonies of death—no compensation can remunerate a man for his suffering in that circumstance.

In that part of the country, where it was notorious that wealth was not accumulated as in others, how would they, Mr. R. asked, be able to send men here fit to struggle with the wealth of the South and West? For, he said, he had no hesitation in saying that the wealth, as well as the power and talent of the country, was travelling in a southwestern direction. Wealth, and wealth only, would become a passport to a seat here. He asked, what must not be the avarice of that wretch who, for $1,500, would sell his country and himself! Look, he said, at the compensation we give to the common sailor; look at the compensation to the captains of our Navy, and to the field and general officers of the Army, and compare it with the compensation the law of the last session went to give members of Congress. If he thought the public now required it, Mr. R. said, he would vote to repeal the law; but nothing short of the proposition he had made would answer the public sentiment. It would be only to forbear the pay of the present session, said he, which I would disdain to receive under this bill. I said, at the last session, I would as soon be caught with my hand in my neighbor's pocket, as vote against the bill then before us, and receive the money, and I say so still. After dwelling on the advantages of his amendment, Mr. R. returned to the subject of the bill. Is there a country on the face of the earth, he asked, where the officers are as well paid as ours? He spoke of the subordinate officers, the military and naval officers particularly. Had any appeal been made, not to say to the generosity, but to the prodigality of this House, in their favor, without being favorably answered? How many bills had passed to make good to the captors of ships-of-war the amount, and the enormous amount, too, of vessels destroyed? How many men in the naval and military service had been elevated from poverty to affluence and splendor? Are we about to affirm, said he, that Representatives on this floor are the only degraded caste in this society, when the emoluments of military, naval, and executive officers are raised to the highest pitch? Shall it be declared by ourselves that this House, as has been well expressed by the gentleman from Louisiana, shall be the mere initiative school for Executive appointments? God forbid, said he, that the time should ever come that this House should be regarded as the mere stepping-stone to other offices—as the ladder to be kicked from under the aspirant when he has attained his object. I have always regarded a seat in this House—and from that consideration have rejected overtures for a different situation—as worth the acceptance of any man of a liberal and honorable ambition. The qualifications to fit a member for this House are such as fifteen hundred dollars per year will not purchase. There was, Mr. R. said, a valuable description of men of excellent talents—of planters and farmers of a certain mediocrity of situation, who could not come, under the old compensation—which he begged the House not to restore to the statute book, unless they meant to make the station of a Representative such a one that none but two descriptions of men could afford to seek it—the opulent nabob on the one hand, and the miserable political muck-worm on the other.

Mr. R. said he had another objection to this bill—that it contained no provision for additional compensation to the Speaker of this House. [Mr. R. having been corrected in this impression, continued thus.] He had been told he had misapprehended the bill, and that a provision to allow him twice the amount allowed to other members was contained in the bill. That compensation, he said, was not adequate to the character and condition of the presiding officer of this House. When I think, said he, of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, my mind naturally reverts to the Onslows of England, and the Peyton Randolphs of America. I look to a man who ought to possess talents of no despicable sort; who ought to have Parliamentary law at least at his fingers' ends; who ought to be the grave and dignified moderator of an assembly of a great and august character; for such it is, and little they do know of it who deem of it less reverently. Never let me see a man in that chair, who is a partisan on the floor and an umpire there. The Speaker of this House and the President of the Senate ought to have a compensation commensurate with the dignity of their stations. Why have we given to Hull, Decatur, Jones, to Scott, Brown, and other worthies in the public employ, ample compensations? Because we expect them to live like gentlemen; and the members of this House are to live—like blackguards. If he was not mistaken, the amount of annual compensation granted to a brigadier was double that which is allowed to a member of this House. If he was wrong in this, let it be stated.

With respect to public sentiment, said Mr. R., permit me to say that, in that ancient and respectable State of which I am an unworthy member, an indication has been given of the public sentiment which I hail as auspicious to the course which I trust will finally be taken here. A resolution, soon after the meeting of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, had been popped on the table, by some eager bidder at the auction of popularity—whom, he knew not, and cared not—expressing strong disapprobation of the act of Congress now proposed to be repealed. That honorable body had acted with a dignity which became them, as they always have acted, and he trusted always would; they laid the resolution on the table, and have ever since refused to take it up; and there it lies nailed like bad money on the counter; and with his consent and good will, so should lie this bill. And why? He perfectly appreciated the motives of the gentleman from Kentucky, who had brought in this bill; but it was not practicable to act in obedience to that public sentiment, on which the gentleman sustained his views of the subject, and fall short of the proposition to refund the excess already received. Mr. R. said he would not meet his constituents, passing the bill and receiving the compensation. I will not, said he, touch one cent of your money. Since I had a seat on this floor, I have always received what the Sergeant-at-Arms has given me; and, if it were necessary to appeal to any man in support of my declarations, I would bring him into court to say, whether I have not said to him, see what you give me, make it right—but I never did (nor will I ever) count one cent I got from the officer of this House. It was not, Mr. R. said, for six or ten dollars a day, or for fifteen hundred dollars a year, that any man who had a particle of self-respect, would sacrifice what he must, to come here. Gentlemen come here for honor—he did not suppose, he said, that any man comes here to take a point of observation from which he can carry on more securely a system of political intrigue.

Who would have believed—who would have believed, he asked, that the people of the United States would have borne all the privations and losses of the late war, and of the measures that led to it; that they would have quietly regarded a national debt, swelled to an amount unknown, to an amount greater than the whole expense of our seven years' war; that they would have seen the election of President taken out of their hands; that they would have borne with abuse and peculation through every Department of the Government and in the commissariat, &c.—and that the great Leviathan, which slept under all these grievances, should be roused into action by the Fifteen Hundred Dollar Law, as a petition laid on the table this morning so handsomely called it? As to that petition, he would say nothing of it, but that the agents who manufactured and sent it here seemed to have done everything but read the law in question; for the principles stated in that petition, as belonging to it, were diametrically opposite to the provisions of the law.

Mr. R. said he trusted, with the honorable Speaker, that they should deliberate on this question with sobriety, impartiality, and dignity; not so much as to the question before the House, as on every occasion which comes before this body, because such a conduct was due to the body itself. He trusted that this House would pursue one or the other of two courses; that it would permit the matter to sleep, and leave it to be settled by those who rode into Congress on the unpopularity of the law. For he should blush, he said, that this House, actuated by public sentiment, should act at all on the subject, and fall short of making most ample and complete restitution. For the sake of the character of this House for consistency, the bill ought not to pass in its present shape. What will the public say? These very demagogues and infuriated partisans, what will they say? That you have made a most ungracious lame amende to the public. We can do nothing properly, said Mr. R., but leave the subject where it is, and let our successors, howsoever and for whatsoever elected, act under the impulse by which they were chosen. The fact was, upon this occasion, Mr. R. said, that those who had labored to excite the public mind, had not labored in vain. The mischief he said, was done. It was thought a fine theme of declamation, and taken up accordingly by the prostituted presses of both factions of the country; but that excitement had in a great degree subsided. Mr. R. spoke of the importance of preserving the character of this House. We, said he, have nothing to give—we hold no levees, we have no retainers, no clients; the Representatives are accountable biennially to their constituents, from which ordeal I feel no disposition to shrink, but which detracts something from the value of a seat in this House, or we should not so often see members vacating their seats here and taking seats in the other House; and, if members of this House, who have served their country with fidelity, are to be hunted down in their districts with every little matter, pertaining rather to the ministerial administration of this House than to affairs of great national concernment, what will be the consequence? Who will accept a seat on this floor on those conditions? What man, he asked, would come, separating himself from his family, to live in narrow uncomfortable lodgings in this most uncomfortable and expensive place in the whole world; if he is to be called to severe account, for a vote, not upon questions of war, embargo, taxes, public debt, &c., but for giving the Doorkeeper a hundred dollars extra at the end of a session, or because he has received himself a pitiful compensation, beneath what any man would earn at any profession who is worthy of a seat here.

One objection had been made to his motion, that it might not perhaps be in the power of every member to make restitution. He should be sorry, he said, to think such was the situation of any honorable member on this floor—he believed it was not. If not in his power at present, it would be to every man hereafter; and he would hold it as a debt of the highest dignity, as a debt of honor, to be first paid. If there should be any one of this House in that predicament, in what respect would he differ from the hundreds and thousands of debtors on the public books? In this: that he would have obtained the money he would owe agreeably to law, honestly, openly, fairly. If such were his own case, Mr. R. said he had no hesitation in saying, that if it went to the last particle of property he had in the world, not excepting, further than absolutely necessary, his wearing apparel, he would refund to the last farthing the excess he had received beyond the amount he would have received, had the law of the last session not passed.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, rose immediately after Mr. RANDOLPH, and observed, that he felt under what disadvantages any gentleman rose after the honorable gentleman from Virginia; but that he had the satisfaction of agreeing with him, as to the course which the House ought to pursue on this occasion, to wit, an immediate and absolute repeal of the compensation law of the last session; and, if agreeable to the honorable gentleman, his opinion was, that the repeal should relate back to the beginning of this session, on the ground that the law of the last session had a similar retrospective operation. Mr. Chairman, I was in favor of the law of the last session; I voted for it; and took occasion then to remark, that I was not solicitous as to the impression which that law might make on the public. Nor, sir, shall I ever be solicitous as to the reception of a law, provided, at its passage, I deem it correct and expedient. I never shall attempt to feel my way through this or any other House of legislation, by beforehand feeling the public pulse. At the same time I acknowledge that such is the nature of the Government, if, after the passage of any measure, it becomes generally unpopular; if by any means it be rendered odious to the great body of the people, that is a sufficient ground of repeal. The inquiry then is, is the compensation law of the last session unpopular; is it odious to the great body of the American people? I think it has become so. To decide this point, I shall not rely upon the intemperate resolves of self-created clubs or assemblies. I shall not trouble you with the impotent presentments of grand juries, however in other respects honorable; they had better confine their acts to the correction of crimes in their vicinity, than to extend their gratuitous labors to supposed national grievances, which they cannot correct; nor shall I dwell upon the ebullitions of factious prints, or factious demagogues, belonging to either party; but I shall rely on solemn legislative resolves, and the decision of the people themselves in the election of members to this House. Respecting these legislative resolves I cannot, with some gentlemen, think them binding on the Representative in all cases whatever, nor with others esteem them of trifling importance. I shall always receive them with deference, as valuable and authentic sources of information, and, when not against the common dictates of my own mind, follow them. And I am happy that those which I have received from the Legislature of Massachusetts, point to a course in this business which I with pleasure adopt. Many other States have also instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to aid in the repeal of this law. But, sir, the people have decided this point; one-half of the members of this House felt the effects of that decision—myself among the rest. Not that they have taken from me anything which I sought after; not that they have taken from me either property or happiness, by depriving me of a seat here. No, sir, they have by that act restored me to both—to my profession, and to the invaluable blessing of a beloved family. Sir, is there anything in a seat here, save the opportunity it affords of aiding to advance the interest of our country? Is there any other consideration? Is there any sum which could induce a man to submit to the privations which members on this floor submit to—privations so eloquently described by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) from the loss of the society of family and friends, to that of life itself? Sir, I have personally endured all but the closing scene here; nothing but the request of friends, and an ardent desire to lend my feeble aid to measures for the good of our country, would induce me to remain another hour in this place. But it is said that the public sentiment is against the mode, not the amount of compensation. Do you suppose that the people cannot distinguish between form and substance? Do you suppose that all this discontent would have been manifested, if the amount had not been augmented? Believe me, sir, you would have the same objections, if you had added two or four dollars per diem to the former allowance. But, sir, it is a matter of dollars and cents, about which self-respect might forever forbid us to dispute. I consider the law of the last session as an appeal to the American people; it was even presumed that they would applaud a provision, the tendency of which was to place their immediate Representatives on an equality, as to compensation, with some of the officers of Government; but they decided this appeal against us; it is appeal in the last resort, and I most cheerfully acquiesce in the decision. I have nothing to ask, nothing to expect from Government or people, except from Government that protection of life, liberty, and property, which, as an American citizen, I have a right to demand.

But, sir, there are other considerations since the passage of this law, which show the inexpediency of its longer continuance. Honorable gentlemen remember, that, as soon as the law passed, nay, I believe, before it received the signature of the President, your table was crowded with petitions for increase of pay and salaries, on the ground that members, having increased their own pay, could not refuse to do the same for others, even where there was not the same equity, as in the case of members. How difficult was it to say nay to these applications! I must confess to you, for one, I could not. Restore to us, then, that independence of deciding on all cases which we had before the passage of this law. That high, independent, honorable ground, on which Congress ought always to stand.

Another consideration: one reason for passing the law was, that our compensation had been for some time, and was then, paid in a depreciated currency. Now, happily for the nation, the credit of the Government is restored, and the currency of the country in a rapid course of improvement; members will no longer be defrauded by being paid in a depreciated medium.

There is another consideration, which my mind almost revolts from stating. Sir, I cannot receive from any man or body of men, anything by way of compensation, which those who pay or bear the burden, think unreasonable. Dig, thank God, we can, but to beg, except from thee, great Author of every good, and every perfect gift! we ought to be ashamed.

It has lately been remarked by an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) to whom I always attend with great satisfaction, that this House is not the favorite with the American people. I do not know that it ought to be, nor the other branch either, except so far as they may aid the Executive in distributing the good things of the Government, as some consider them. Look at your powers under the Constitution; see how many more opportunities you have to oppress than to relieve the people, and I fear the fact but too well answers the theory of the Government. Your very first power is, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," which you do with unsparing hand; "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," which power you at times have exhausted; "to regulate commerce," which you have sometimes destroyed by regulation; "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies." You have been much more anxious to give the freedom of your country to foreigners, than to grant freedom to the oppressed of your own citizens. Yes, sir, you have passed law after law on the subject of naturalization; but for a long time have maintained the silence of the grave as to a system of bankruptcy, as to the relief of your own people, creditors as well as debtors; for I hold that a correct system of bankruptcy is equally beneficial to both. Look, too, at the bills reported at this session, for what has been called internal improvement, for universities, roads, canals, and various other objects, started now merely because the President happened, by the miscalculation of some inferior officer, to state that there was a large surplus in the national Treasury—you pounce upon it like birds of prey upon their game. Sir, an overflowing in the Treasury is not always a sign that the pockets of the citizens are full; the reverse is too often the case. Repeal your land tax—brush away your various other internal taxes—reduce the duties on importation one-half—pay off your national debt—then, if you have a surplus in your Treasury, apply it in any way authorized by the Constitution, which shall render the people contented and happy. Remember, the greatest internal improvement you can make is in the condition of the people. Because some favored regions, in return for their valuable products—their cotton and tobacco—have gold showered down upon them, it is not the case generally. I can point you to other portions of our country, to others of our fellow-citizens equally deserving, who, instead of the ability of paying the heavy dues exacted of them by Government, are, at this inclement season, surrounded by their suffering families—their children crying for bread. Yes, sir, a region which feels as little the benign rays of Government as the soil itself does those of the blessed sun through the mountains of snow which now cover it. Do you expect, then, to be the favorite of the nation, unless you embrace a few of the many opportunities which occur, to promote the direct interests of the people, and render them contented and happy? An opportunity now offers; another will soon be presented in the passage of the Bankrupt bill, to do justice to the feelings and the expectations of the American people. But we are told that our consistency, our honor, is at stake; that we ought not to yield this point to the people. By whom, and against whom is this contest? The Representative against his constituents—the few against the many—one against thirty-five thousand? The issue of such a contest is by no means doubtful. And what is the stake? Whether you shall receive two, or four, or six dollars per diem, in addition to the former compensation. Sir, it ought not to be a subject of a moment's deliberation. On this point I beg leave to introduce what I deem a respectable authority. About the year 1752, a bill passed the Parliament of Great Britain for the naturalization of Jews. I mean no disrespectful comparison—it was called the Jew bill. The nation was in a ferment—church and state supposed in danger. As soon as Parliament assembled, at the next session, a motion was made for the repeal of the obnoxious act. A distinguished member, (Lord Lyttleton,) who had voted for the Jew bill, made the following among other pertinent observations:

"Resolution and steadiness are excellent qualities; but it is the application of them upon which their value depends. A wise government will know where to yield, as well as where to resist; and there is no surer mark of littleness of mind in an Administration, than obstinacy in trifles. Public wisdom, on some occasions, must condescend to give way to popular excitement, especially in a free country, where the humor of the people must be considered as attentively as the humor of a King in an absolute monarchy. Under both forms of government, a prudent and honest ministry will indulge a small folly, and will resist a great one. Not to vouchsafe now and then a kind indulgence to the former, would discover an ignorance in human nature; not to resist the latter at all times, would be meanness and servility."

Mr. HENDRICKS said, he was decidedly in favor of a repeal of the law of last session, but he did not think the bill before the Committee the best possible substitute. This bill contemplated the repeal of the law of last session, from the time of its passage. That this bill, then, while it speaks the language of repeal, allows the members on this floor to put their hands into the Treasury and draw the proportional part of fifteen hundred dollars, which will be coming to them from the commencement of the present Congressional year, to the time of the passage of the bill. That there was no repealing clause in the law of last session, and, of course, nothing else was necessary, than a bare repeal of the law. The old law, on the subject of compensation, would stand revived, of course. This simple repeal was what he wished, and with such a retrospective view or operation, as would at least express an opinion of this House, that none of its members shall, or ought to, receive any compensation during this session agreeably to the principles of the law of last session. That this retrospective operation was objected to, but it was admissible, on the principle that Congress had a right to fix their own compensation, and, on the ground, that the precedent fixed at last session was in point. The law of last session had a retrospective operation. Mr. H. said that, on the ground of the public sentiment, he had no doubt. That the public sentiment of his district had to him been fully and officially expressed through the medium of the Legislature of Indiana; that the Senators from that State had been officially instructed, and himself requested, to use their votes and influence, to have that law repealed, and, if no such expression of public sentiment had been expressed, he should have no doubt of its existence. There was scarcely a man, he believed, in the remote settlements of Indiana, who had not heard and reprobated the law; and it was no wonder, said Mr. H., that his constituents disapproved of that law. Their ideas of expenditure were very unlike those of all the Eastern cities. Six dollars per day sounded large enough to them. Their sources of wealth, means of procuring money, were few and narrow, when compared with the commercial opulence of a maritime country, or even the independent competency of an older State. They were rescuing their country from a wilderness. Agriculture was in its infancy, and the produce they had to spare—their corn and their beef—in the neighborhood of a plentiful market, bore a very low price. Mr. H. said that, while he would not contend for a refunding of any compensation received at last session, it was not to be presumed that any had drawn heavily on the Treasury since the commencement of the present session, and it would ill become this House to repeal a law, because it was wrong, and at the same time, practise all the wrong which that law authorized, to the date of its repeal. It would be holding out to the people the semblance of doing what they required, when we were not so doing, and if the people in the passage of the offensive law had been injured, this kind of legislation would be adding insult to that injury.

That it had been said, that lowering the compensation of members would have a tendency to exclude from this floor the talents of our country; but, let it be remembered, said Mr. H., that the best talents were found in the councils of the nation, at a time when no compensation was certain or scarcely probable; that the early days of our Republic would be an abundant testimony to this remark.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 15.

Mr. YANCEY presented a petition of the religious society of Friends, in the State of North Carolina, praying that Congress will adopt some measures towards colonizing the free people of color residing within the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHARP, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Gabriel Winter, which was read; when Mr. S. reported a bill confirming certain lands in the county of Arkansas, in the Missouri Territory, to the heirs of Elisha Winter, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PICKERING moved (agreeably to notice given by him yesterday) for leave to bring in a bill further to regulate the Territories of the United States, and their electing delegates to Congress; which motion, together with a bill therewith submitted, was referred to Messrs. PICKERING, GROSVENOR, and HUGH NELSON. The bill was afterwards reported, twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. Root, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the legal representatives of soldiers who enlisted to serve in the late war and died before muster, the same pay and bounty as such soldiers would have been entitled to, if they had been duly mustered.

The bill from the Senate, concerning the Attorney General of the United States, was twice read and committed.

THE COMPENSATION LAW.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to repeal the act changing the mode of compensation of the Senators, Delegates, and Representatives in Congress.

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, asked the indulgence of the Chairman, and through him the indulgence of this honorable body, for a short time, whilst he should assign some of the reasons which would influence his vote on the question under deliberation. I ask not, said he, the charity of the House to be extended to my feelings. I disdain the idea of relying for the tranquillity of my feelings on the forbearance or charity of any man or set of men on this earth. "As I hold myself personally responsible for every sentiment and expression which I utter here or elsewhere, to every man entitled to the treatment of a gentleman, so I hold every individual having this title personally responsible to me for every infraction of my rights, or violation of my feelings. I have frequently witnessed the avidity with which malignity and cowardice fixed their fangs on the victim, who would patiently writhe under their torture.

I cannot condescend to notice the strictures of the member from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) on those who voted against the law at the last session, farther than to say, that he did not yesterday represent truly what he said at the last session. He did then expressly confine his felonious comparison to a single individual, who had contended, in argument, that the old compensation (viz., six dollars a day) was amply sufficient to meet the expenditures of members at this place. This cannot be forgotten by the member; it was attended by circumstances which render it impossible. It is certainly within the recollection of many, very many respectable members of the House.

Sir, I voted against the law at the last session. I received the full compensation to which I was entitled under it as a member. I doing this, I believed that I acted with perfect integrity and honor; I still think so. In point of honor and integrity, I shrink not from a comparison with any member of this House, or any man in this nation.

I opposed the law at the last session, not from the miserable, contemptible motives which some of its warm advocates then had the presumption to attribute to those who voted against the measure. Not in order, as has been insolently remarked, to creep through a dirty canal to popularity. Not with the view to seek, through such a medium, a short-lived popularity, more evanescent than the baseless fabric of a dream. I am proud to believe, that, on my part, no necessity existed to conciliate, by such means, the people whom I have the honor to represent. They are too intelligent, too independent, and too honorable. When I came into Congress, it was by the triumph of principle; it was a conquest obtained by the people over cunning, duplicity, and fraud; it was a voluntary effort on their part to get rid of a man who had long misrepresented their sentiments and their feelings. It was their victory, not mine; a victory which afforded me pleasure, not from selfish or personal considerations, but from the consolatory reflection that principle had triumphed. When the election terminated in my favor, it was very doubtful whether I should ever be able to take a seat in the Congress of the United States. I was from home but once from the time I became a candidate, and returned to the district in which I reside not until long after the close of the election. I have never flattered the follies nor the vices of mankind. It is not in my nature to flatter man. I am not indifferent to popularity. But I desire that popularity only which is the voluntary tribute to virtuous, independent, and honorable actions; the reward for services performed with fidelity and integrity—no other would I enjoy.

When the law of the last session was under deliberation—the law which it is now contemplated to repeal—I saw and felt the delicacy of my situation. To be called on to vote on a question, in which I was personally interested, although the amount of interest was too trifling to influence any honest or honorable man; to influence any description of persons, except some miserable mendicants, or trembling paupers. For what man, I ask, who is fit to come here—who is qualified to represent the free, the independent people of this nation—who could be influenced by pecuniary considerations—who could not, by the proper exertion of his own abilities, in domestic pursuits, benefit himself and his family far beyond anything which the Government can afford or ought to give. The delicacy of my situation did not result from a doubt as to the course which I ought to have pursued, which I determined to pursue. The question was no sooner presented to me, than my convictions of the impolicy and impropriety of the measure assumed the force of intuition. Yet I knew that the most pure and honorable motives were ever liable to misrepresentation. That an honest opposition to a measure of an impolitic character, especially if it required anything like what some term self-denial, would be attributed to a base, low, and contemptible mode of courting popularity; that little souls, bursting with malignity, would be constantly scattering their filth and their venom round. I, sir, have never trembled nor cowered before mortal man; nor have I ever stooped to a mean act to promote my private or my public interest. At the last session I took occasion to state that I was satisfied that the depreciation of money, and the increased price of every article of consumption—of living—had rendered the six dollar compensation insufficient to meet the reasonable and decent expenses of members at this place. I have uniformly maintained this opinion. I would then have voted for a law, raising to a moderate amount the daily pay of the members to a sum which would have borne the same proportion to the expense of living which the old compensation bore at the time it was fixed, provided the law had been postponed in its operation until the 4th of March next. But I will never vote for any measure in which my personal interest may subject me to the imputation of being influenced by selfish, sordid, and mercenary motives.

The mode of compensation presented an objection which was irresistible and conclusive.

Every appropriation of the public Treasury should be clear, definite, and certain. No mystery should exist. The people for whose benefit alone this money should be touched, ought to have the means of judging with certainty as to the amount of expenditure, in order to enable them to judge of the justice and the wisdom of the expenditure. The services rendered by the members of Congress, by the members of every legislative body, are, from their nature and character, contingent and uncertain—depending on the relations of the country—sometimes on the prosperity, and frequently on the adversity with which she may be visited. They are not services of that character which can be fairly and properly compensated by a fixed annual salary. The various misrepresentations which have existed in reference to the law of the last session—the law which now claims the attention of this honorable body—which has obtained the serious attention of this nation—the difficulty which has been experienced by the people in understanding its provisions, are, to my mind, conclusive evidences that it ought to be repealed. Why, then, should the law of the last session be so pertinaciously adhered to? A law which proposes a compensation by salary, when, in truth, no single idea which enters into the complex term called salary is preserved by that law. What is a salary? A certain, fixed, and determined sum, to be paid at certain fixed periods—dependent on no other contingency but the continuance in office. Whereas, the salary provided by that law depends on several contingencies. The member must be in his place on every day during the session, or must be prevented, after taking his seat, or after setting off from home with the view to take his seat, by sickness, from continuing in the first case, or in the second from taking his seat, to entitle him to the salary. For, if he is absent a single day, or any number of days, from the service of the House, either with leave or without leave, a deduction is made of a sum equal to that which the absent days bear to the whole number of days in the session or sessions, if there be more than one in the year. I can truly say, that I do not know the opinion of the majority of the people in the district in which I reside on the subject of this odious law. As far as I have heard not much has been said in relation to it. This I do not attribute to the indifference with which they have viewed the question. I have no doubt they are as sensitive on the subject as the people of the United States generally are. I account for it on the ground that they know the course which I pursued on the question—the vote which I gave. I again most peremptorily deny that my opposition to the law at the last session was the result of that miserable, contemptible policy which several gentlemen have presumed to charge upon those who have opposed that measure. Sir, I will trouble the Committee no longer.

Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, said, the question under consideration was too agreeable to excite unpleasant sensations; because, it gave every member an opportunity of speaking of those objects most dear to his heart; of himself and his constituents. It is a trite observation, that the reason lovers are never tired of each other's company, is, because they are constantly talking of themselves. The same observation might be applied to the Representative and his constituents. They are, or ought to be, equally alive to the interest and reputation of each other. If so, it may reasonably be expected, much will be said on the subject under consideration, which may be truly termed a selfish one. He said his constituents had, unsolicited, re-elected him, without requiring of him any other pledge, than that of his past conduct. They had confided to him the free and unqualified right to exercise his own judgment, after a full hearing, on every question which might arise. Such generous confidence, on their part, at a time of unusual excitement and ferment, deserved, and should receive of him, the most profound regard for their interest. Their approbation, next to that of his own conscience, would be the only boon he should aspire after, so long as they continued to honor him with their suffrages.

He said he was not sure the course he should pursue, on this occasion, was that which was best calculated to insure to him a lasting popularity. He granted it was in accordance with the present prevailing opinion; but he recollected when a navy was unpopular in this country, and particularly so in his district; when he was charged with political heresy for his adherence to that establishment; when, instead of increasing the Navy, it was deemed expedient, by its friends, to yield to the popular clamor against it, and, at the close of a most unpopular administration, to pass a law to sell a part of that which existed. But a navy is now the favorite of the people; not a voice is raised against it, and its increase is loudly called for. He rejoiced at the change of the public sentiment in this instance. But may not the opinions of the people undergo a similar change with regard to the compensation of members? He thought it by no means improbable. How odious was the United States Bank a few years ago amongst the Republicans. What a darling is the National Bank now with many of them. He said he made these observations to show he was too well acquainted with the instability of public opinion, to make it a rule of action, and to acquit himself of the imputation of being actuated by a desire to obtain popularity; a desire always honorable, when it can be accomplished by fair and honest means.

He said he could not agree with his venerable colleague, (Mr. FINDLEY,) who seemed to think the great change which had been made in the representation of Pennsylvania at the late election, was not to be ascribed to the compensation law, inasmuch as seven or eight members who had voted against that law had not been elected to the next Congress. He, Mr. R. thought the compensation law had prevented their re-election; he was justified in this opinion by a recurrence to facts. Unceasing industry had been made use of, both in and out of this House, to identify those who voted against that law, with those who voted in favor of it, as equally culpable, if not more so. For this purpose, in Pennsylvania, on the 4th of July last, a toast was drank, and circulated with assiduity, at a respectable meeting; at which it was said one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of that State presided, with a most unhandsome, unjust sentiment attached to it. If he recollected right, it was this: "The fifteen hundred dollars compensation law; the receiver is as bad as the thief." To the dissemination of such uncandid sentiments may fairly be ascribed, in a great measure, the failure of the election of the members alluded to. This toast should not have been noticed, but for its accordance with a more exceptionable sentiment, expressed by the gentlemen from Virginia last session, and reiterated during the present debate, "that if he had voted against the compensation law, he would as soon have been caught with his hand in his neighbor's pocket as to have taken the money."

Are these sentiments just, when applied to the opponents of the compensation law? Will they bear the touchstone of a fair and candid examination? Is it not the duty of every good citizen to submit to the laws which are passed by a majority, however injurious they may be in their operation, to him as an individual? If he is bound to submit to those laws which injure him, may he not fairly, honestly, and honorably, avail himself of those which benefit him, although he voted against them? By what system of morality is a member of this House excluded from the benefits and advantages of the laws passed by the majority? Was not the compensation of the members, when it was first fixed, deemed too high by many? Did not many of the then members oppose it on that ground? Did any of them refuse to receive the sum fixed on? Was there any other law under which they could receive their pay? Was there then any political adventurer hardy enough to implicate those who voted against the law, in the censure which attached to those who voted for it, because they received the compensation? Was there any other law than the fifteen hundred dollar law, (as it is commonly called,) under which the minority could have received their pay last session? If the law had been popular, its opponents would not have been entitled to any of the credit. As it has proved unpopular, they ought not to incur any of the censure. Let the question be examined by analogy to other cases. Will any gentleman say that those who opposed the National Bank (even under the belief that it was unconstitutional) were bound by honor or morality to decline subscribing for the stock? The gentleman from Virginia, certainly would not, because he declared his determination to act otherwise. Suppose a majority of Congress should, in a fit of frenzy, pass a law to sell the unlocated lands at six cents per acre, instead of two dollars, would any one say it would be immoral or dishonorable in those who opposed the passage of the law, to take out warrants under it? But it is an old proverb, that "misery loves company." If true, it is not surprising that those who have committed political suicide, should, Sampson-like, endeavor to crush their opponents beneath the general wreck their own conduct has produced. Mr. R. said, he made these observations to rescue himself, and those who had sincerely acted with him, in opposing the passage of the law, from imputations which were unfairly and unjustly attempted to be cast upon them.

Mr. R. said this might be hailed as a proud day for the people. Their power and influence are portrayed in strong and vivid colors by the sincere repentance and deep contrition of many of those who voted for the law; the sincerity of which was evidenced by their anxiety to be foremost in undoing what they had hastily done last session. He trusted the people would receive the sacrifice now made to their will (the repealing of the law) as an ample atonement.

The arguments urged by the people at the late elections in favor of the repeal of the law have been and are more convincing and conclusive than anything that has or can be said in this Committee; and, but for the reasons assigned as an apology for the enactment of it, though not urged as reasons why it should be continued, it would be unnecessary to trouble the Committee further.

Mr. R. said, those who are in favor of a higher sum than six dollars per day, contend that justice and sound policy require it; that the compensation of a Representative ought to be such as would enable the virtuous and intelligent citizen, of every class in society, to serve his country in the National Legislature; such as would enable him to live like a gentleman when here, and maintain his family while absent; such as would insure the continuance of the services of the ablest heads and the best hearts in the country; and such as would put him, in some measure, on a par with the other officers of Government—make him independent, and place him above the influence of Executive patronage, which six dollars per day is altogether inadequate to do.

These reasons are plausible, if not strong, in favor of a higher per diem than six dollars. They naturally suggest the question, what are the requisite qualifications to make a good Representative? The answer is plain: Wisdom to discern and integrity to pursue the true interest of his country. Will a high salary or a greater per diem have a tendency to bring men with such qualifications into the National Legislature, sooner than the moderate sum of six dollars per day? Would it not have a contrary tendency? Would it not stimulate every political adventurer, who had nothing to lose and everything to gain by securing an election, to supplant by unfair means the meritorious candidate in the confidence of the people? The qualified candidate would feel too much respect for his own character, and that of his constituents, to gain their votes by soothing their follies, or flattering their vices; but the unqualified candidate would be all things to all men—he would affect sanctity with the religious; laugh with the merry; treat the avaricious; flatter the vain; cringe to the proud; promise everything and perform nothing—and then blame those whose popularity he wished to destroy, for his failure to accomplish what he had promised. He would nine times out of ten succeed. But leave, said Mr. R., the pay so low that it cannot be an object worthy the pursuit of any one, and the people will look for the best qualified man to fill the office. He will not seek the office; the office will seek him, and it will find the proper person.

Gentlemen appear to think that a good salary, or a handsome per diem, is essentially necessary to bring a respectable representation into this House, and to make them, when here, independent of Executive influence. If so, it should begiven. But, when did gold give intelligence to the head or integrity to the heart? That it will not do the former, is proved by the conduct of Ferdinand VII.; and that it never has done the latter, may be collected from the characters and conduct of Bacon, Marlborough, Dodd, and Grattan;—the latter of whom, while indigent, was the bold defender of his country's rights; yes, and of the rights of man. His fellow-subjects, grateful for the many services he had rendered them, gave him £50,000 sterling. They made him rich, or, in the language of gentlemen, independent; but they paralyzed the patriotism of his heart. He ceased to be the eloquent champion of civil liberty, feelingly alive to the miseries and afflictions of his oppressed countrymen.

Enable your Representatives, said Mr. R., to live in ease and affluence—to contract habits and tastes above the intelligent part of their constituents, and inconsistent with the plain republican manners of your country—and you qualify them to become the panders of power, and the creeping, cringing sycophants of the Court. You cannot by your laws imbue men with virtuous, independent, stern, and inflexible characters. The laws of nature and of nature's God, aided by an early education, can only accomplish the object you aim at.

But, all abstract reasoning on this, as on most other subjects, said Mr. R., is dangerous. It leads to errors, which facts and experience alone can correct. He might be wrong in the views he had taken, but, while he retained his present impressions, he must act in unison with them. He should, therefore, vote for filling the blank with the lowest sum named, which was six dollars. If this sum should not be agreed upon, he thought it would be better to repeal all the laws fixing the pay of members, and leave the subject so that the next Congress, who had been elected expressly with a reference to this subject, should be obliged to act on it. The people would then have an opportunity of testing the sincerity of those whom they had elected, because they professed an entire opposition to the compensation law.

Mr. R. said, the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) to refund, would meet with his cordial support, if consistent with a proper respect for the integrity of the representative character, of which he entertained some doubts.

But he was admonished, by the recollection of a favorite saying of a great, but eccentric genius, that words are the counters of wise men and the money of fools, to say no more.

Mr. BARBOUR said that, before the decision of this question, he asked the indulgence of the Committee, while he very concisely stated his views of the subject, and the reasons which would influence him to vote in favor of the bill upon the table, having for its object the repeal of the compensation law of the last session.

Mr. B. said that he should vote for the repeal of that law, partly for the reasons which had induced him to vote against it at the last session, and partly for a most important reason which had occurred since that time—he meant the decided expression of the public opinion on the subject. When this question was before the House at its last session, he said, he was opposed to the passage of the law, first, because he considered the compensation to members not as a remuneration for labor or personal services—not as an indemnification for individual sacrifices—but as intended to defray the expenses of members, incurred by reason of their situation as members. He thought it was obvious the compensation could have no relation to the individual sacrifices of the members, because they vary with the varying situations of different members. Some gentlemen are engaged in vocations which are more, others in those which are less lucrative; some in the extensive practice of a profession yielding them a very ample revenue, infinitely beyond the amount even of the compensation proposed to be repealed; others in pursuits yielding a very inconsiderable profit, perhaps not half equal to the amount of that compensation. The idea, then, of the pay of members having any reference whatever to this consideration, would involve the necessity of this admission, that some must be remunerated beyond what they are entitled to, whilst others would fall as far short of that standard. This proposition, then, could not for a moment be sustained. Nor could he think that the compensation was intended as a remuneration for labor performed. Upon this subject, he appealed, not only to the practice under the Federal Government, but to that which prevailed in the nineteen distinct State governments which composed the Confederacy; and he asked whether there was a State government in the Union in which it was not distinctly understood that the compensation to the members of its Legislature had reference only to the payment of expenses? This idea then was consecrated by the usage and custom of the country.

He admitted that, considered in any other point of view, than as relating to the payment of expenses, the per diem allowance of six dollars was insufficient; nay, he admitted that, considered even in that point of view, it was clearly inadequate to the maintenance of a member with his family; but, considered in relation to the expenses of a member himself, which he said was in his opinion the true ground on which to put it—it was sufficient for that purpose; he said, that as his habits of expense were not those of profusion, on the one hand; so, on the other, he never ran into the opposite extreme; he thought the old allowance of six dollars per diem adequate to a style of living, which, while it avoided both these extremes, was comfortable and genteel. Another important reason which had induced him to vote against the law of the last session was this: that it embraced within the pale of its provisions the then Congress by which it was passed; he said that he knew the Constitution had confided to Congress the power of fixing their own compensation; this was the result of necessity, as there was no other power but the Legislature, to which it could be confided; but, at the same time, upon the great principle, that no one ought to be a judge in his own case, because of the difficulty, even with the best intentions, of being impartial in such a situation, he wished the law to have excluded from the benefit of its provisions the Congress which passed it. What added great weight to this consideration was his knowledge of the propensity of mankind, whenever self was concerned, to impute to those, who were called upon to act under such circumstances, motives which they never felt; for nothing was more true, it was a melancholy truth, than that man, though utterly unable to search the heart of his fellow man, will yet undertake to estimate the motives of all his acts—and if they be within the possible reach of imputation, to ascribe them to bad rather than to good intentions. As well then because of the delicacy of the situation, as because of a desire to avoid any possible imputation, he had been opposed to that feature of the law of the last session which embraced the then Congress.

He came next, he said, to an important reason, which had great weight, and indeed would of itself be decisive with him; he meant public opinion.

As far as he had been able to procure information, he felt no hesitation in expressing it as his opinion, that no measure, since the institution of this Government, had excited so much dissatisfaction, as the one now proposed to be repealed; some few gentlemen had stated, and he made no doubt correctly, that their constituents had not complained; but with these few exceptions, he believed it might be said, that, from one extremity of the Union to the other, there had been an almost concurring sentiment of disapprobation. Gentlemen mistake if they suppose that it was a storm raised only by a few factious printers; they equally mistake, if they suppose that it was merely a momentary ebullition of passion among the people. There was indeed, sir, at first a violent excitement; gentlemen might call it, if they pleased, a storm—but that storm, even when its fury abated, subsided into a fixed and settled discontent at the measure; from a free communication with his constituents, he was enabled to say, that it met the disapprobation, and excited the discontent of the grave, the reflecting, and the deliberate; and such he believed to be the case with an immense majority of the American people. With this impression, had he voted for the law, he should now vote to repeal it; having voted against it, it furnished an additional reason for its repeal, besides those which had influenced him originally against it.

If this respect were not paid to a deliberate expression of public opinion, he said that the practice of the Government would be in direct hostility with its theory, and the principle on which it was founded. We were sent here to represent the people. If, then, we knew their wishes, upon a particular subject, and yet did not pursue them, was it not a solecism, was it not a contradiction in terms, to say that we represented them? He thought, as had been said upon another occasion, that the House of Representatives ought to be the "image" of the feelings and sentiments of their constituents." Establish a contrary doctrine, and there is an end of representative Government.

He said, he had been gratified by the declaration made by the member from Kentucky, in the opening of this debate, that he meant to avoid everything like excitement; it had been his purpose, too, not to have uttered a word calculated to excite the least feeling, or awaken the least sensibility; the subject was one of sufficient difficulty and delicacy in itself, without adding to them by the course which the debate took in this House. He was sorry that the gentleman from Virginia had, on yesterday, made use of an expression as singular, as it was unwarrantable, to this effect: that he had as soon be caught with his hand in his neighbor's pocket, as to vote against the bill and receive the money. In receiving the compensation as fixed by law, he said that he had acted as he thought right—he did not owe an account of his conduct upon this subject, either to the gentleman from Virginia, or to the House; he was accountable for his conduct upon that occasion, as well as all others in his public life, to another tribunal, to his constituents, to whom he hoped and expected to justify himself; if he did not, they knew their remedy. He would, however, make this remark, that before the gentleman from Virginia could attach blame to him, that gentleman must first do what he, Mr. B., certainly should not do; that is, he must ascribe improper motives to himself, and those who voted with him; because, he said, it could not be improper in him to receive money, which was honorably and fairly acquired. Believing the motives of those who voted for the law to be pure, it was thus acquired. But, he said, he would not pursue these remarks further; he would conclude by expressing his wish that the bill upon the table might pass.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked leave to explain. He hardly knew how, he said, to express the disappointment he felt at having occasioned, by the few remarks he yesterday expressed, the strong excitement which gentlemen appeared to feel. He recalled the attention of the House to the original declaration on his part, prior to the passage of the bill. He had said, prior to the passage of the bill—when it was impossible to know who were in favor of it; when the decision in the Committee of the Whole had led him to believe that a very large majority indeed were in favor of the bill—yes, Mr. R. said, he did say a priori, (and he repeated the assertion,) that he had as lief be caught with his hand in his neighbor's pocket, as vote against the bill and receive the money. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day told the House, that this sentiment the people have ratified, by declaring what he (Mr. R.) would not here repeat. He had, he said, at the last session and now, pronounced a rule of action for himself; he had not set up his opinion as a code of morality for others. He had, he said, a right to his opinion; he was glad to find his opinions had influenced the conduct of one honorable member. The declaration he had made at the last session—for he hardly now knew who had voted for and who against the law; who took the money he was profoundly ignorant, with the exception of two individuals, himself and his colleague, (Mr. TUCKER)—that declaration he now repeated. I stand on this floor (said Mr. R.) under circumstances peculiar. It is a great while ago since I made another declaration—I am really reminded sometimes of the exclamation of poor old King Lear—

"The little dogs and all,

Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, see, they bark at me!"

Honorable gentlemen are mistaken. So long as I stand on this floor uncorrected—[Mr. BARBOUR here rose, and begged leave to ask, whether the gentleman, in his Shaksperian quotation, respecting Tray, Blanche, &c., had any allusion to him? If he had, he should like to hear from him.] I believe, said Mr. R., I am entitled to the floor—I am under the correction of the Chair. He said he was not under any excitement; he had risen with no such view as to produce it. He had risen for the purpose of stating, that, so long as the presiding officer of this House deemed his language parliamentary, he held himself responsible for it to no man out of the House, but at his own will and pleasure. The Speaker of this House, he said, was appointed by the House to preserve decorum and the order of debate. So long as he, said Mr. R., permits me to go on unchecked, I will express my opinion on this and every other subject, without restraint. The time has gone by, sir—my situation as well as the situation of other honorable members on this floor is changed; the time has passed, when I might say like another of Shakspeare's characters, who, if not witty himself, was the cause of wit in others—when if not great myself, I could be the cause of greatness in others. No man can now raise himself to eminence by flying at my throat, or barking at my heels.

It appeared to him, Mr. R. said, that an excitement had been raised on this occasion, which unquestionably he had not himself felt until to-day, if he felt it now. During the last session of Congress, he said, it would be well recollected, he had made a proposition that the act should take effect, not during the present Congress, but at a future time. That proposition had been overruled on the suggestion of the honorable Speaker, that it seemed to him more proper that each Congress should assess its own wages. An observation had been made also by an honorable and venerable member from Massachusetts on that occasion, which had its proper weight, in consequence of which Mr. R. had withdrawn his motion. But was it not competent for any honorable member to have renewed it? Why had not this vituperated law been opposed at the last session with more energy, eloquence, and argument? Why had the opposition been reserved to this session of Congress? Why had not gentlemen brought forward their propositions, and put them by yeas and nays, on the journal of this House? Why, said Mr. R., I recollect perfectly—I must be excused in saying it—I recollect distinctly, that the division in the Committee of the whole House on that bill was not the same as the division in the House, and the argument at the fireside was unquestionably not in every case the argument on the floor. I bring forward no charge against any member—but the fact was as stated. The gentleman from Virginia says he will not account to me for his conduct. Have I called on any man to do so? I have asserted my principles merely, and I will maintain them.

Mr. R. said he had risen barely for the purpose of explanation; but, being on the floor, he hoped he might be permitted to make one remark on the observations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which certainly had created much mirth. I had hoped, said Mr. R., they would have allayed the asperity which had been excited, which I dislike to meet—not certainly because I am afraid of it. But, I am about the close of my parliamentary career, and should be sorry to go out of the world out of charity with any man, from the highest to the lowest—from Alpha to Omega. I should wish to close my political, as my physical life, in peace with all mankind; but, if it must be closed, with my back against the wall, not in charity but in strife, be it so!—I submit.

Mr. BARBOUR said that, in the few remarks which he had this morning made to the Committee, he had reference to what he thought, and had called an unwarrantable expression of the gentleman from Virginia; and, he thought, had parted with him as lightly as the occasion would permit. When, said Mr. B., I rose, I asked the gentleman whether he alluded to me in his Shaksperian quotation; the gentleman declined an explanation, and afterwards took occasion to say, that he did not consider himself responsible, either in or out of the House, for what he said on this floor. On this occasion, said Mr. B., I will only remark that, in regard to a gentleman having thus disavowed responsibility for anything said here, it is not material to any one what he says.

Mr. RANDOLPH begged pardon of the House—he begged pardon for again rising. The interruption of the gentleman from Virginia had been unparliamentary—an interruption with the pallid face and tongue of passion was not that sort of interruption, Mr. R. said, which he would acknowledge on this floor. No man, said Mr. R., has a right to ask me, in debating on general topics, if I alluded to him. I am addressing the Chair, the country, and the House; and no man has a right to say do you mean me? Because, if he has, every man in the House has a right to get up, and say and me, and me, and me. I spoke a priori, said Mr. R., before the bill passed. Let others make rules for themselves. I never called on the honorable gentleman to give me an account of his conduct, or of his pay. I know nothing of his money, nor how he has expended it; nor do I care. It is a matter, as he has properly said, for him and his constituents. What, Mr. asked, was to be the consequence of this kind of admission? It was not for him to pursue it. What was to become of the freedom of speech on this floor, if, so long as the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or the Speaker of the House, did not think proper to interpose—and, Mr. R. said, he had never found any backwardness on their part in calling him to order—if a man, speaking his opinions, talking about public affairs in the general, is to be caught up, he would not say by any drawcansir who happened to get into that House, but by any man who thinks he may obtain distinction, or show his valor, by marking any individual on this floor? In regard to getting rid of responsibility, said Mr. R., the honorable gentleman may place that on what footing he pleases. I disavow the right of any man to rise upon this floor, and demand of me whether I allude to him when I make use of a general expression. There are many individuals in this House whom I do not know, for I never met them in the House or out of it; they would any of them, Mr. R. intimated, have the same right to demand explanation. He was very sorry, extremely sorry, he said, the matter had taken this turn. As he said before, although there was some little of feeling on his part on the present occasion, there was nothing of passion.

Mr. WRIGHT said: I hope, Mr. Chairman, to be indulged while I present my view of the late compensation bill at the time of its passage, and also my objections to its repeal at this time, although I should still prefer its modification to a per diem at the rate of ten dollars; as it would be better understood and preferred by the people. Sir, in order, distinctly to present my view of the subject, I must be permitted to take a review of the compensation given to the old Congress, prior to the establishment of the present Constitution. A compensation was fixed, by each State Legislature, for its own members, at a time when money was of great value; when the finances of the States were humble, and in a body where the members of Congress had no control. That the State of Maryland gave her members of Congress eight dollars per day, and the same Legislature, at the same time, gave her own members two dollars per day, which she has long since increased to four dollars per day, a measure justified by the depreciation of money, ascertained by the rise of every necessary of life—so that, on the passage of the compensation bill, I really felt myself quasi instructed by the conduct of the Legislature of my own State to increase the compensation of the members. I never conceived, that the making the compensation commence with the session, the invariable practice of the State Legislatures could be liable to reprehension. I therefore felt myself justified by the example of Maryland, in the commencement and extension of the compensation, also by my own knowledge of the sacrifices I had made, and the conviction on my own mind of the justice of giving the value of the sum fixed on in 1789. It was the substantial value of the compensation I felt myself entitled to, and did not believe that value would be exceeded by the compensation bill. Would any man in the community be satisfied with the price given in 1789, for any article of life he had to dispose of, nay, would he not laugh even at a member of Congress who should be simple enough to make him such a proposition, although backed by the remark of the unchanged state of his own compensation? Sir, was the six dollars, in 1789, considered a just compensation? was the value of that compensation substantially increased by the late compensation bill? are questions that irresistibly force themselves on the mind, in the consideration and just decision of the question. Sir, we have been charged with a want of delicacy upon the subject, and with the political heresy of raising our own compensation. By the Constitution, it is expressly provided, that the members of Congress "shall receive a compensation for their services, to be fixed by law," and they of course must in the first instance make that law. Congress in 1789, in the exercise of that power, thus necessarily and constitutionally devolved upon them, acted a modest and self-denying part, and no doubt with an eye to the popularity of their infant Republic, by reducing the compensation from eight dollars, heretofore given, as I have shown, to six dollars per day, whose conduct upon that occasion justified the confidence that had been reposed in them. And here permit me to remind gentlemen, that an amendment was proposed to the Constitution, "to limit the power of Congress in the increase of their compensation, so as to make it take effect only at a future Congress," and that amendment was rejected by the States; hence it appears that the very objections now urged by the Boston Hartford Convention gentry had been overruled by the people, who were not afraid to trust Congress, originally, to fix their compensation, or to raise it, when, in their discretion, it became necessary, and refused to tarnish the fair fame of their own Representatives, selected by themselves, as the Constitutional sentinels of their lives, their liberties, and their fortunes, by the adoption of the amendment. Sir, at the time Congress fixed their own compensation at six dollars, they fixed the compensation of most of the officers of the Government, and, strange as it may be to tell, we are charged in the face of the world, in the passage of the compensation bill, with raising our own compensation and leaving the compensations of the officers of Government as they were. Sir, I will detect and expose the unfounded calumny by showing the state of the compensation then given to the respective officers of Government, and their present compensations. In 1789 the compensation to the President was fixed at twenty-five thousand dollars, when Washington, the favorite of the nation, presided, with the use of the furniture, and other effects; then in his possession belonging to the United States. Mr. Adams, at the commencement of his Administration, in addition to the twenty-five thousand dollars per year, was allowed fourteen thousand dollars for his term of four years to supply himself with furniture. Mr. Jefferson, during his Administration, was allowed also fourteen thousand dollars for the same purpose. Mr. Madison, at the commencement of his Administration, was allowed fourteen thousand dollars for the same purpose, and after the conflagration of the President's house, an additional sum of fourteen thousand dollars was allowed, which I understand has not been expended. Thus you see how the President's original compensation has been increased. In 1789, the Secretaries of the Departments were allowed, some three thousand five hundred dollars, others three thousand dollars; those of the first class have long since been allowed five thousand dollars, and those of the second class, four thousand five hundred dollars; thus adding fifteen hundred dollars to each Head of a Department. In 1789 the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court were established; to the Chief Justice, four thousand dollars, to the associate Justices, three thousand five hundred dollars each. These compensations were predicated on the labors contemporaneously assigned them, which have been reduced one-half, and will therefore justify their present allowance it is conceived in the opinion of every man of reflection, who will examine into the case. At the time of fixing their compensation, the United States were divided into three circuits, and two of the Judges assigned to ride each circuit, twice a year; and the Supreme Court, then directed to be held twice a year, at the Seat of Government. This was soon found impracticable, and to defy the physical powers of men of their high standing and respectability. The United States were afterwards divided into six circuits, and one of the Judges of the Supreme Court was assigned to each circuit, to act with the Judge of the district as a circuit court; and the Supreme Court reduced to one session per year, at the Seat of Government; and now, by a bill on the table, it is contemplated to relieve the Judges of the Supreme Court from the labor of circuit Judges, so as to enable them to perform the high duties of the Supreme Court, which they have been compelled to adjourn before half the important business of the nation was finished, in order to perform the less important duties of the circuit court—which bill I hope and trust will soon become a law.

In 1789, the Attorney General was allowed a salary of fifteen hundred dollars; in 1792, four hundred dollars were added to his salary. In 1797, five hundred dollars more were added to his salary. In 1804, his salary was raised to three thousand dollars, and this day a bill from the Senate was received in this House, to furnish the Attorney General with an office, fuel, and stationery. In 1789, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, had each fifteen hundred dollars, but they now each are allowed three thousand dollars; and yet, after the increase of the compensation of all the officers of Government, and of many, by adding to their compensation a sum equal to the whole compensation allowed by the bill to members of Congress; and after permitting our own compensation to remain at six dollars per day, more than a quarter of a century, we are charged by demagogues with raising our own compensations and leaving the officers of Government neglected; and the party printers, from one end of the United States to the other, have been engaged in fanning the unhallowed flame, to destroy the fair fame of patriots, I will not say worn out, though grown gray in the public service; who had just before, by their exertions, brought an honorable war to a glorious conclusion, and thereby obtained for this nation imperishable laurels. Sir, it will be recollected, that, twice during the war, a proposition was made, to increase our compensation which was twice rejected, and I perfectly recollect myself remarking, "that while our citizens were engaged in the tented field, in the defence of our common country, we ought to be content to fill our less arduous legislative functions, for the compensation then allowed, but, as soon as peace was established, I should most cordially concur in its increase." Sir, I last session expressed my preference of raising the compensation, by an increase of the per diem, though I am satisfied there do not exist any solid objections to the system, modified as it was by the bill.

Mr. Jefferson, that distinguished statesman, in his Notes on Virginia, advised their convention to adopt such a system, for their judiciary and Council; and I satisfied my constituents, that as to the judiciary, it would improve our judicial mode of compensation, if it was not a preferable mode of paying the members of Congress. They admitted that a member of Congress ought to have as much as a judge per day, at least; as the judge's duties were more at home, whereby they could better attend to their domestic concerns, and were not subject to half the expenses of members of Congress. I stated to them the vast number of cases of claims against the United States, which could not be sued; which Congress had judicially to decide on; and the vast amount of these claims, exceeding in value all the controverted cases, before all the judges of Maryland; and I presented to them the last report made to the Legislature of Maryland, showing the number of days each of the judges of Maryland had attended that year, giving in no case less than twenty-five dollars per day; and I pointed their attention particularly to the compensation which one of their judges had received, amounting to seventy dollars per day—who, on the 4th of July last, had the temerity to drink the toast, "The Fourteenth Congress—

H. OF R.

Charity begins at home"—which, I understood, he had a hand in making too—and I informed them that the district judge of Maryland, who drank and aided in making the said toast, had, I had no doubt, never received less than twenty-five dollars per day, which I had endeavored in vain to ascertain, by a letter to the clerk of the district court. I showed them also, by the same report, that a judge in Baltimore had received at the rate of $140 per day for his attendance the same year. I remarked to the people, that if a jurymen was absent one day, he lost his per diem, and that, peradventure, the very judge who had been absent a week, receiving his compensation as fully as if he had attended, had to perform the extraordinary task of fining that jurymen for his day's absence. I remarked, that I represented thirty-five thousand people, who, if they were taxed, directly, to pay my compensation, would not be compelled to pay four cents and a half per head—a sum not equal to the price of half a gill of whiskey—and that I never could believe that such a petty sum could ever induce one man to discard me, who had never been charged with a bad vote since I have been honored with a seat in Congress; and I well know how much they appreciated my late conduct in opposing the specie payment bill, which had saved this nation from the most intolerable oppression, if not from a civil war. And I can assure you, gentlemen, that my remarks, which had a double aspect, had the desired effect. Thus, sir, we trace the clamors against the compensation bill to the union of such toast-makers with the Knights of the Lamp-black, who ascended the whirlwind to direct the storm, and who, to gratify their political partisans, each charged the opposite party with the passage of the bill, and thereby got us between two fires. Such a scene was acted near the Delaware line. On one side it was charged on the Republicans, and, on the other, on the Federalists; and this is what is called the evidence of the popular opinion. Sir, the liberty of the press is all-important to the preservation of the liberties of the people, but its licentiousness is baneful to their happiness and dangerous to their liberties. And while I execrate the wretch who can pollute his press by the envenomed shafts of slander from behind his masked battery, aiming their deadly poison at the fair fame of the most distinguished patriots of America, I am bound in justice to admire those printers who adopt the maxim—ne quid falsi, dicere audeat, ne quid veri non audeat—and hail him as my compatriot, devoted to the preservation of the liberties of his country. Sir, we have been just now told by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DESHA,) in the language of warning, what are the sentiments of the people of Kentucky, and how all-important it is to repeal the law; that they were not satisfied even with him, although he voted against the law, because he received the money. That gentleman just informed me that when he left home corn was twenty cents a bushel, and one of the officers of this House informed me when I arrived here that Indian meal was three dollars a bushel; so that really a Kentuckian was little qualified to judge of the compensation necessary to support a gentleman genteelly here, particularly if we could believe the story, which I always thought fabulous, as to the luxuriant growth of the articles of that country, although from high authority, "that a cane stuck down to mark the growth of a hill of corn, had been forgotten a few days, and had itself produced two nubbins!" And where chickens, pigs, and all kinds of poultry, are said to grow spontaneously. If that gentleman had been so kind as to have given us this warning at the passage of the bill, we might have avoided the political rock on which so many of the members have been shipwrecked, but unfortunately for us, upon that occasion, that gentleman, and most of the gentlemen in the opposition to the bill, observed the most dignified silence, and, although they were defeated in their opposition to the bill, they appeared to me to bear their defeat like philosophers. He tells us that the honor of being a member of Congress ought to be considered as a part of the compensation; and that the people have instructed us, by a general expression of their disapprobation of the bill, and that they ought to be obeyed. Sir, that the honor of a seat on this floor is a strong inducement, I readily admit, but that it ought to be considered as a part of the compensation, I cannot believe, particularly when I reflect that a dish of that article, however elegantly dressed, even by a French cook, would make but lean diet.

Sir, I am constrained to remark, in reply to gentlemen, on this subject, who are reprobating the measure, and thus inculcating themselves—for they all took the money, except one, notwithstanding my advice at the time of the passage of the bill, when I proposed that a clause should be inserted to amend the bill so as to excuse honorable gentlemen from receiving the increase of the compensation, lest they might be subjected to the unkind remark, "that the receiver was as bad as the thief"—and who, after receiving the money, condemn the measure: Mala avis suo quæ cacat in nido. It is an ill bird that defiles its own nest. I have now shown you the principles upon which I advocated the bill, as it related to compensation of the members. I must now beg your attention to the great considerations of State, which, in a political point of view, ought and will have their influence. Our Government is composed of three branches, the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judiciary. These branches are co-ordinate, and ought to be independent of each other. The compensation which they receive is directed in the same terms by the Constitution, and ought to be a compensation suited alike to the remuneration of all the departments, so as not to leave either under the influence of the other, and thereby endanger their respective independence. The Legislature holds the first rank, and is the body assigned by the Constitution to investigate the conduct of the Executive and the Judiciary, in the discharge of their executive and judicial functions. The House of Representatives is the grand inquest of the nation to investigate the offences of the officers of Government, and, by impeachment, present their corrupt violations of the law and the Constitution, which the Senate are directed to try; hence the necessity that the people should possess such a patronage as would bind the Representatives to them, and secure the honest discharge of these important duties. The President possesses such a patronage as, in corrupt hands, with a corruptible Legislature, might endanger the liberties of the people, and ought to be guarded against by a retroactive patronage of the people; that in the ratio the compensation of the Legislature is extended, in the same ratio the patronage of the people is increased, and the liberties of the people secured. The appointment of their Representatives is the act of the people, and the compensation to their Representatives the only patronage the people possess.

Sir, in the investigation of the conduct of the President, by impeachment, with his immense patronage, by members so poorly paid, what might not be the case, in corrupt times, with a corrupt President, when the corruption of one more than one third of the Senate, if the House of Representatives should be found incorruptible, would defeat all the salutary provisions of the Constitution, and endanger the liberties of the people! But, sir, it is worthy our consideration, what may not be legislatively effected, when we see the President of this widely extended empire, possessed of a greater patronage than any potentate in Europe, and when we cast our eyes across the Atlantic, and see a nation whose Government was once the boasted palladium of English liberties, and which was as well calculated as a kingly government could be to secure them, if executed agreeably to the letter and spirit of the instrument, but by borough elections, and the patronage of the Crown, that constitution has been declared, by Englishmen themselves, to have lost all its value in the preservation of their liberties. There, sir, we see the Minister always enabled to lead a majority, by the power of the Crown, to appoint the members of Parliament (who receive no compensation as members) to office, to be held during the pleasure of the Crown, and who are thereby as easily led by the Minister, as a herdsman would lead his pigs with a basket of corn. And here, although a member of Congress cannot hold an office while he is a member, his friend, by his influence, might, and even to the member's own benefit; or he himself might be appointed to office, and, on resigning his seat, might hold the same. This bill, sir, securing the small patronage of fifteen hundred dollars per year, and with it the devotion of the Representative to the people, is now proposed to be repealed, as being obnoxious to the people, and we are told by an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the people from the mountains of that State have instructed him. I am satisfied of that fact; but I have no doubt their instructions have been predicated upon the misrepresentation of the meaning of the law, from the false clamors in circulation by the typographical gentry, who have made them believe that the fifteen hundred dollars was to be paid, even if the members never attended a single day; and I much doubt whether they ever saw the law, or whether, if they had, they could understand it, unless it was translated into Dutch. As to my own district, I am satisfied they wish their Representative to receive the full value of the six dollars, at the time it was originally fixed. My successor approved of such an increase, and his Federal competitor was the only man I ever heard publicly declare, in that district, that six dollars was enough, but his declaration had not there its intended effect. Sir, I am so well satisfied that the people do not wish to pay their Representatives less than was fixed by the Congress of 1789, that they never were dissatisfied with that sum, and that they are too just to hold their Representative to a nominal sum, in discharge of a real one, that all that is necessary to their giving a just judgment, is to be perfectly in possession of the evidence, of which this discussion will possess them; and I am satisfied that any opinion the people may be presumed to have given, has been produced by false clamor, and misrepresentation. I therefore propose an appeal from the opinion of the sovereign people, irritated and misinformed, to the same people correctly informed and in good temper. We have heard of the appeal from King Philip asleep to King Philip awake, and therefore we have a sovereign precedent for it. Sir, I am satisfied of the issue of this appeal, and that it would be a libel upon the people, to charge them with a disposition to pay their members of Congress less than the real value of the compensation, at the time it was fixed. And I would ask my honorable colleague from Baltimore, whom I understand stands quasi instructed to repeal the law, whether every necessity of life, compared with the like articles in 1789, do not bear two or three prices, and whether he would not regard it as a libel on his constituents, if they were charged with compelling their neighbors to take for any article they had for sale the same nominal price it bore in 1789. And I call on my highly respected friend from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) to say, if he was called on to decide such a question, between two neighbors, whether he could without a violation of his honor and his conscience decide that six dollars now should be received for an article worth six dollars in 1789, which would now command two or three times that sum, and whether he will deny, to his compeers, on this floor, that measure of justice he would blush to deny to a neighbor? I entreat honorable gentlemen to dismount from their popular hobby horses, on which they have rode into this House, and let go the reins, and take hold of the reins of reason, and do justice to themselves, and to the House. Sir, if I have discovered too much ardor in the discussion of this subject, I shall rely on the Roman apology for my excuse—"Juvenile vitium, regere non posse impetum." It is the fault of youth, that it cannot govern its own violence. Sir, after thanking you, and the House for their polite attention and urbanity, I will conclude, by remarking, that I am as much devoted to the people as any man ought to be. I always bow with submission to their will—I informed my constituents, whatever instructions they gave me I would obey, or resign my seat—I have no instructions—I therefore shall be gratified that this subject should be postponed to the next session, in which I have no interest; when the members of Congress will come to this House from the bosom of their country, and from every part of it, correctly informed, of the will of the people, which, in a Republican Government, ought to be regarded as the supreme law.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Kentucky, said he was in favor of repealing the act of the last session of Congress, changing the mode of compensation to the members of Congress. The people consider the mode as well as the amount objectionable, and that was a sufficient inducement for him to vote for its repeal. We have heard, said Mr. F., that the voice of the people was not to be regarded on this occasion; but I hold myself responsible to my constituents, and, knowing their wishes, I feel bound, by every moral as well as every political tie, to carry that will into effect. The right of the people to instruct their Representatives, is one that I hold as sacred as any other principle in this Government; the people will be obeyed. On ordinary occasions they do not interfere in the legislation of the country—leaving their Representatives to act from their best judgment, because they are a liberal and a patriotic people; but, when they do interfere and speak, their voice should be obeyed;—others may act so independent as to disobey the voice of their constituents—he should take a pleasure in a different course. With some exciting causes not necessary to be detailed, it was not remarkable that the people should be dissatisfied with the law. It was known that the debt of the Revolution, and of the late war, amounted to upwards of one hundred millions of dollars, and that it was good policy to pay it off as soon as possible, without oppression to the people. Economy was therefore an object of importance, and every measure calculated to take money from the Treasury, and particularly to pay the members of Congress, naturally excited jealousy and suspicion; and I do not believe that any member will differ from me in the necessity of all reasonable and practicable retrenchment in our expenditures, until the people can see their burdens lightened, and then we may rely upon the good sense of the people for any measure that the good of the nation may require, although it may cause the expenditure of money; for, let it be recollected, that the people in every part of the Western country, and indeed throughout the nation, paid the taxes to carry on the late war with Great Britain, with alacrity and without complaint or murmur, because they considered them necessary to support a just and necessary war, declared and prosecuted to vindicate the rights and honor of the nation. The people of the United States love their liberty much more than they love their money, and indeed would part with the last drop of their blood, and mingle it with the soil of liberty in supporting the independence of the nation, rather than see it possessed by a haughty, tyrannical, and malignant foe. Members in whom I have confidence, who have served their country long and faithfully, and whose patriotism no one can doubt, say the compensation of one thousand five hundred dollars is not too much. A member who has not had experience, cannot so well judge in this case; but I can inform these gentlemen, that the time was considered unfortunate, and although members may not get as much as they might make at other employments, yet it is a high and respectable station. We should make the sacrifice until our constituents are willing to give us additional compensation, and, if they never agree to it, I for one will never ask it. I am willing to serve them with a compensation they are willing to give; and, although it is supposed that six dollars will not bring to Congress the first-rate talents of the country, we see that many more wish to come than the people are willing to elect. And if any individual thinks that six dollars a day is not a sufficient compensation, there is no compulsion on him to offer; the people must seek some other character; and although we should receive a sufficient amount to indemnify for expenses, no member should calculate upon making large sums of money. My constituents urged many reasons why this measure was ill-timed; our taxes had been very much increased; although lessened at the last session, and some repealed, still they were called upon at this time for the heavy taxes of the preceding year; they were willing to pay them as the exigency of the times required them; but they were alarmed at other burdens, and it is well known, that internal taxes have never been favorites with the Republican party, and I hope never will. The mode of collecting them, is always inconvenient and oppressive. Sometimes the internal tax gatherers (and excise men, as they are called) are unfeeling and harsh, and they never have been nor ever will be favorites with the people, nor share in their affections and confidence. Such is the happy form of our Government, that the people will investigate, and think for themselves, and withdraw confidence from such of their public servants as may attempt to lay the foundation for oppression and self-aggrandizement; this is one of the great securities against slavery and despotism; a principle not acted upon in any other part of the world. One other circumstance had a tendency to raise the opposition of the people; it was said, that it was easy for Congress to give themselves money, whilst the poor wounded soldier might starve for want of his small pittance—the soldier who had waded swamps, and had to eat roots for his rations, while fighting the battles of the country; and it is obvious to us all, that some of these soldiers go a begging along the streets. Although this cannot be properly charged upon Congress, as, to the honor of the nation, the last session was liberal to their soldiers in making provision, yet the contrast was drawn between men in power, and the widow and orphan, who had lost their stay and comfort in the service of the United States; and although Congress has done much for those distressed individuals, I hope to see them do more, until the sources of their sorrow shall be dried up. While I am on this part of the subject, I cannot omit to mention, that I regret to see such difficulties in the administration of the law, after it has passed. After the most conclusive proof is taken—sufficient, as I would suppose, to satisfy any man or set of men—the officers and clerks in some of the Departments make so many technical objections, that it is almost impossible for a common man or applicant to know what to do, so as to comply with these arbitrary rules, and, when he has his proof complete, he is often delayed by your office hours, and a few days dancing attendance will spend the amount of his claim. On this subject I speak from experience, as I have had to attend some of the Departments on the business of my constituents and others, since the commencement of the present session.

But, in voting compensation to members of Congress, none of these difficulties exist, no such technical objections are started, no office hours are heard of, no defect in the certificate or proof—all is smooth and quiet.

I shall therefore vote to repeal the law of the last session, and vote to fill the blank with six dollars, the old compensation; and in doing this, I vote the will of a majority of my constituents, and they have a right to say what they are willing to give, and I am bound to take that sum, and no more. It is my opinion, that I not only vote the will of my constituents, but of a large majority of the United States, and when my constituents wish me to vote in a certain way, I will do it, or resign my seat, and let them elect a man that will. I derive all my power from the people, and they have elected me, because they have confidence in me; and if I betray that confidence, I should be unworthy of them.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) tells you he lives here at the rate of six dollars a day. I will not deny that the expenses of this place are very great, but, instead of six dollars per day, the gentleman may spend twenty dollars per day, and certainly this would not justify a vote to support such extravagance out of the public funds.

Rather than vote for a greater sum than six dollars per day, in opposition to the wishes of my constituents, I would prefer serving for nothing during the session; although the members may refuse to obey the will of their constituents, and call it buzz or clamor; but this doctrine will only do in Monarchies, or aristocratical Governments, where the people are not considered as the fountain of power and authority; but here it is otherwise, and the people will maintain their rights; let any man inform the people that he will not obey their voice, and see if such a man be elected to a place of honor and confidence.

Unused to this theatre, I was unwilling to trouble the Committee on this subject; but I considered it my duty to express my sentiments upon a subject which had excited so much ani-madversion, and upon which I consider a majority of my constituents to have expressed their opinions.

I must return my thanks for the indulgence of the Committee before I conclude, and express a fear of having trespassed upon the patience and time of the House.

Mr. HARDIN said, he had been on the strong side of the question at the last session, having voted in favor of the act now proposed to be repealed; and he believed he should be on the strong side also at the present session, being one of those who intended to vote for the repeal of that law. To show his motives for so doing, he said he should offer a few observations, lest he should be branded with the imputation of that kind of political prudence which appeared to characterize the present day, and which always selected the strongest side. He was sorry to hear it said to-day that this subject was rather a mirthful one than otherwise. For his part, Mr. H. said, from the time he had voted for the law at the last session, he had never felt very merry on the subject. He had felt it a misfortune that he, in obeying the dictates of his own judgment, had been one of those who had incurred the displeasure of the American people, and felt the necessity of humbling himself to obey their will. There was also another reason why he thought the passage of that law by Congress unfortunate; because it had afforded to demagogues throughout the nation an opportunity to ride into every office in the Government; because he was afraid the great hostility shown to that act would introduce a four-pence-half-penny mode of doing business. On that score, Mr. H. said, he did not feel very merry, though he certainly was given to pleasantries sometimes—perhaps not so much so, however, as the gentleman before him, (Mr. Ross,) who could even be merry on misfortune.

Mr. H. said he was sorry that any unpleasant feeling had been excited, that any acrimony had arisen in the House. He was fully persuaded that those who voted for or against the bill at the last year, had equally acted from honorable motives. After it had passed, would it not have been a mere affectation of delicacy for those who voted against the law to have refused to take the money? If they had done so, Mr. H. said, he should not have thought they were sincere. He had never certainly viewed the conduct of gentlemen who voted against the bill, yet took the money, as at all censurable. But there was one remark he could not help making, which he hoped no gentleman would take to himself, that when the obnoxious measure was in agitation last year, those opposed to it were as silent as possible; the grave is not more silent than were they. The bill had not many enemies, and was openly opposed by very few. Mr. H. said he had heard on the question for the engrossment of that bill for a third reading but few nays, and when the yeas and nays were required on that question, but 15 supported the call. What was the inference? That few, if any, more than those 15 were opposed to that bill. On the next day, when the yeas and nays were called, there were 67 to 69 opposed to the passage of the bill! Now, if there was any gentleman in this House—he did not say there was, he hoped there was not one—who secretly wished that bill to pass, though he voted against it, he deserved censure. He did not know of any such gentleman, and he repeated, he hoped there was none; but he could not help wishing that much the same zeal had been manifested in opposing this bill at the last session, as in condemning it now, and perhaps he and others would not have had to pay the forfeit they had incurred. My time of trial, said Mr. H., is over; I honorably declined a re-election, because, I beg you to understand, I could not have been elected without going the rounds, and begging pardon for what I do not consider to have been incorrect. * * * * *

He could not consent, he said, to go about begging the people to give him a seat in this House.

He said he had never considered fifteen hundred dollars for the yearly services of a member of Congress as a quid pro quo. The men of talents of our country, Mr. H. said, were generally from twenty-five to forty years of age; new men, born to inherit no fortune; men who have worked their way in society, by dint of their own talents and exertions. How could any such man occupy a seat here, unless he received not only enough to defray his expenses, and enable him to live as a gentleman should, but enough also to support his family at home, without breaking in upon that small capital he had laid up? Many men, it was true, came here, screwed themselves up in holes like penitentiary cells, and, on six dollars a day, saved more whilst here than they could make anywhere else. But men of talents, who come here for a flyer, for two or four years, cannot support themselves on it as they have been used to live at home. As to the idea of patriotism being a sufficient motive to come here, it was absurd. Patriotism, is that which urges a man to serve his country without expectation of personal benefit or reward. But, Mr. H. asked, did the gentleman from Kentucky believe that there was a single man who ever came to Congress, who did not come without some other motive than that for the gratification of his own vanity, to have his ears tingle with the ring of greatness, or for the advancement of his own interest? Such language as that of the gentleman, who considered patriotism the leading and sufficient motive for bringing men here, sounds handsomely, cuts a good figure here or in a newspaper, but there is not much substance in it. No, Mr. H. said, it was not patriotism that would bring men of talents here, to the great prejudice of their private interests. He agreed with gentlemen that this House ought not to be the mere stepping stone to Executive offices; not a theatre on which a man should show his eloquence for a day or two, and then go off in a lucrative embassy to Europe, or elsewhere. A seat in this House, he said, was in theory, and ought to be in practice, the most honorable of any station in the Government, for it is held at the will of the people, and not of the President. Mr. H. did not go further into the reasons which had induced him at the last session to vote for the compensation law, since the subject had been fully illustrated in the report of the select committee, on every topic but that to which he had referred, respecting the class of the people among whom the talents of the country were to be found.

Mr. H. then proceeded to assign briefly the reasons which influenced his vote to repeal the law of the last session. He did not, he said, allow to the right of instruction that latitude for which some gentlemen contended; but the will, not only of his constituents, but of the whole people of the United States, he thought himself bound, in the present case, to comply with. He agreed, whether this will was made known in the form of regular instruction, or in any other way or shape, it was equally obligatory. He could not agree with the gentleman from Virginia that a Representative is, from the term of his office, bound to obey the will of his constituents. A member of this House, Mr. H. said, was to represent the particular interests of the people who send him to Congress, whenever those interests are in question. Having done that, he is to assume the more expanded and important character of a legislator for the nation, and consult the general good. All general laws ought to be acted on with a view to that which produces the most general good. Am I, said Mr. H., to vote for a law to sacrifice the interests of the whole nation, because it will benefit my immediate constituents? No; I represent my constituents on particular topics, and on general questions consider what the general good requires. Every member of this House is the Representative of his constituents; but he is at the same time a legislator for the nation. I do most solemnly protest, said he, against legislative instructions—I detest them more than Adam did the serpent. They are the greatest bane that ever crept into a well-regulated Government. It is an encroachment by the States, in their corporate capacity, on the rights of this House. The members of this House, with the Senators, Mr. H. said, made laws to operate on the people, not on the States in their sovereign capacity; and the States, therefore, had nothing to do with instructions. These had originated, he said, he had no doubt, in a wish to screen some favorite man here who had been doubtful whether his acts were popular or not, from all responsibility therefor to the people. But the people throughout the American continent seemed to have expressed their decided disapprobation of the law now proposed to be repealed. Hence, in retracing his steps, he should not only follow the will of his constituents, but the voice of the American people. For, he said, if the will of the American people was contrary to that of his constituents, he should obey that will, believing it his duty to legislate for the nation.

Mr. H. said, he could not agree with his colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) that the people were dissatisfied with the manner, and not with the matter, of the act of last session, though such might be sometimes the case in the gentleman's district. In regard to this law, when, in my district, I met with a sensible man, I conversed with him sensibly; when I was accosted by a furious demagogue, I gave him as good as he sent; and, when I came across a fool, I laughed at him. I would ask the Speaker (Mr. CLAY) one question. Does he believe that his constituents, any more than mine, would have objected to the manner, if we had fixed our annual compensation at five hundred dollars? Not a man in my district would have taken exception to such a change in the mode of compensation, unless he wished to come here in my place. Mr. H. said, he did not believe the present compensation too high, but he must conform to the views of the people who, he had no doubt, wished to see the compensation reinstated in the situation in which it stood before the law passed.

Mr. H. said, he felt some little anxiety that this course should be taken; not only because it was the will of the people, but because it would take a powerful tool from the hands of political demagogues. The persecuting spirit had been carried by them to great lengths, in regard to this act; so far, as his colleague (Mr. JOHNSON) had informed the House, that a man in Kentucky had refused to let a young man court his daughter, unless he would forswear the compensation law. I never heard of this fact before, but do not doubt but the honorable gentleman either knows the fact practically, or has heard of it. If practically, the old gentleman stood very much in his own light, for I do not know how he could have suited his daughter better than by promoting instead of preventing the match. But, all through the State of Kentucky, the same spirit prevailed. If a man came into the county court to be appointed a constable or a surveyor of the road, he entered his solemn protest against the compensation law. If a petty demagogue wanted to get into the Legislature, he must post up or put in the newspapers his protest against it. To deprive such knaves and rascals of any pretence under that act, Mr. H. said, he would repeal it. Why, some of the new fry that are coming into Congress, he had heard, had declared that they would vote for the repeal of the act; and, if it was not effected, would reserve all their pay over six dollars per day, and at the end of each session lay it out in churches and meeting-houses!

It had been said, that money had resumed its former value. Not at all, he said; though he hoped Congress would restore something like life to the circulating medium before they parted hence. Another argument used in favor of the repeal, was by a gentleman who, having voted to increase his own compensation, could not resist the exorbitant demands of others for an increase of their pay. That consideration, he said, did not affect him. If it was proper, he would cheerfully increase the compensation of any public officer; if not, he would as cheerfully vote against it.

The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT), who had surely spoken in his best manner, and done justice to this subject, asked what should be done with the next fry—so Mr. H. said, he called them—he knew no better name for them—with the next fry that came into this House. They rode into this House on the law of the last session, avarice in their hearts, and patriotism in their mouths! Their patriotism told them they did not want the money, but their avarice told them they did. And for them, he said, let them take the six dollars per day, or the responsibility of raising it. I am willing to leave no law in existence regulating the pay, and to let the next members fix their own compensation.

There was one more reason he assigned which had induced him to conform to the wishes of the people, and vote for the repeal of the law of the last session. This House, he said, was the only branch of the Government which seemed to have any analogy to the people; the only one which formed any counterpoise to the weight of the Executive and other branches; the only barrier against encroachments on the rights of the people or of the States. It was impossible for this House so to act as to retain the confidence of the people, unless they obeyed the general will, and show a willingness to respect it. But, gentlemen had said, the alleged expressions of public opinion were mere newspaper slang, the work of newspaper editors, &c. But, said Mr. H., he believed that was not the fact. He did most solemnly believe that it was the public sentiment. It might have been originally the work of demagogues, whose breath had raised one wave, which had produced another, until a storm had covered all the popular ocean. But, he said, he had no right to reason on the motives or causes of the excitement. A man has no right, when the people are unanimous, to conclude that they are mistaken; he must either comply with their will, or resign. For his part, he would not, knowingly, misrepresent the will of his constituents on this floor.

Mr. H. said, he did not agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH), for whom he had always a very high respect, who said that he knew not how gentlemen could vote for the repeal of the law without refunding what they had received under the law. Mr. H. said, he had revolved this subject in his mind, and saw no difficulty in it. He had voted for the law, because he believed it correct; he should vote to repeal it, not because he believed he had done wrong, but because of an anxiety to conform to public sentiment, particularly on a matter between a member and his constituents. But he would not consent to acknowledge that he had cheated the people out of their money, as he should do by voting to refund it. There was nothing dishonorable in keeping it. Besides, the power of Congress did not enable them to enforce such a law, if they passed it. Was it possible for them to pass a valid law taking away from an individual money earned under a contract between him and the Government? Could they pass a law to take away from the judges of the Supreme Court the salaries which they have received for years past? No; a salary may be destroyed prospectively, but you cannot take away from a man what he has earned; you cannot deprive a man by law of a vested right.

Mr. CONNER said that he should trouble the Committee, with but a very few remarks on this subject. He should have gone more at length, had not the reasons for raising the compensation been so fully and ably detailed in the report of the honorable committee to whom that subject had been referred, and which had gone forth to the nation, as to make it unnecessary for him to add one word in justification of the vote last Winter. He fully concurred in the reasoning and conclusions of that report; his opinions remained unchanged. But his constituents and he believed those of no district were more highminded or liberal, were dissatisfied with the measure; some, as it regarded the mode, others the amount: a considerable portion of which dissatisfaction, he believed, however, had proceeded from unnatural excitement and distorted representations. But the fact existed; and he should vote for the repeal of the law in compliance with their wishes. He should wish that this law might be repealed immediately; that the pay might be reduced to the original sum; that all laws on the compensation might be repealed after the 4th of March; and that our successors, who might come more fully charged with the views of the people on this subject, might fix their compensation. Perhaps, then, the people might extend their liberality, or perhaps those who are, as the gentleman from Virginia says, bidding at the auction of popularity, may reduce even the per diem of six dollars. Let it take its course. He had received a request from the Massachusetts Legislature, which he should not regard. He should receive instructions only from his constituents. Those members of the Legislature, who were inhabitants of his district, had a right to request him; the others he knew not, in any relation whatever to his public capacity. The honorable gentleman from Virginia had mentioned, that a similar resolution was offered to the Virginia Legislature; but it was ordered to lie on the table, and there it had lain ever since, nailed, like bad money, to the board; that from Massachusetts had unfortunately obtained a currency. One word as to the duty of a Representative, in relation to the wishes of his constituents. He knew that it had been contended, that the right of instruction does not exist with the people; that we stand here as isolated beings, to carry out the destiny of the country, without looking one moment to the source from which we derive our power. Sir, no one is a more fervent votary to the Deity Independence, "Lord of the Lion Heart and Eagle Eye," than I am; but there is too much independence in this doctrine for a popular Government, nor was it ever practised, or ever can be, on this floor. How stands the fact? What is the experience on this subject? Where do you find a Representative from a manufacturing district that is not a loud advocate for domestic manufactures; from a commercial district, whose thoughts are not on "the mountain wave," and amidst the very scene of quays and insurance offices; one who has been in the army, who does not think of "guns, and drums, and wounds, God save the mark?"—a Delegate from a Territory, who is not busily engaged in manufacturing new States? He knew of one worthy gentleman, a Delegate, who, he believed, would be very willing to fabricate his Territory into one State; but was now very industriously engaged in carving it into two; assisted, as he understood, by a Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, who, if the allegations that had been heard against him on that floor (of which he knew nothing however) were true, would certainly not be for having the word Sunday, either in the Constitution or the laws.

He would put a case: Suppose that we, the Representatives, think it just and proper to declare war against a formidable Power—Great Britain for instance; but the people think no such thing; they believe they have sustained "no essential injury;" they feel no resentment, nor have they any disposition whatever to encounter the perils and privations of such an arduous contest. I ask you, dare you declare war under such circumstances; a contest which would exhibit the remarkable phenomenon of the Government at war, and the people at peace? No, sir, they would wage a civil war against their Representatives—they would take off our heads. The spontaneous answer of every member would be, I believe, we dare not venture upon it. Here, then, you surrender your judgment to the wishes of the people. This doctrine of independence of the people was derived from Great Britain, from whence we derive a great many things. He well recollected it was strongly advocated by Mr. Burke; a man, indeed, of transcendent talents, of prodigious knowledge, of brilliant fancy, but a pensioner of the British Crown. It may also have been advocated by the Great Commoner, once so called, afterwards Lord Chatham—but he also became a pensioner. Mr. C. said, he spoke not this in disparagement of those great characters; certainly nothing that he could say, could disparage them. They would go down the stream of time to the latest posterity as illustrious men. It resulted from the nature of the British Government, where the throne and not the people make the House of Commons. He recollected to have recently seen in a British print, that it cost Government £12,000, something more than $50,000, to get Mr. Canning elected to Parliament.

It is not then from such a source, said Mr. C., that we are to derive principles as applicable to our form of Government; as long as the popular form of Government exists (and God grant it may always) the people will govern, and we will and must submit. As to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, to pay back to the Treasury the pittance, the excess over six dollars, which he had drawn from it, he never had seen any one in his district or anywhere else advocate a measure which would be a confession of crime, followed by an act of meanness.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, said, he had at the last session of Congress voted against the compensation law, and would not for any consideration have voted otherwise. His main reason for the vote was, that the war debt was yet unpaid. He should not vote to fix the daily pay at eight dollars, because he believed, that in so doing, he was pursuing the principles of the Congress of 1789, of the men of Revolutionary principles, who did not act without good reasons. So far from believing that to follow their example would lead to anything like aristocracy, would to God, said Mr. H., that we would pursue their course in other matters as well as this. He would vote, he said, for a sum which should be now equal in value to what six dollars then was. The finances of the Government, when six dollars was established as the pay, were low; the Government was not able to meet its expenditures; it could scarcely pay off the interest of the national debt—and would gentlemen now, greatly changed as the circumstances of the nation are, virtually reduce the pay then established, by making it the same nominal amount as was then allowed? Would gentlemen permit public clamor to produce a national evil? For it would be, to fix a compensation for the members of this House at a rate below that on which they could live. Mr. H. said, he was extremely sorry to see any excitement on this occasion; for it was one on which the House ought not to be excited. If persons had treated the matter improperly out of doors, it was no reason why gentlemen should act improperly within doors. He did not know, he said, that eight dollars now were equal in value to six in 1798, but he hoped the state of the currency would improve; and, if money became more valuable, eight dollars would be about a fair compensation.

Mr. W. P. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania, said, as this question had already been very fully discussed, he should trouble the Committee with but a very few remarks on it. It must be obvious, said he, to every member of this Committee, that, in fixing our compensation, we are exercising a very high and delicate trust. It is not analogous to any other duty which we are called upon to perform. When we fix the compensation of the Heads of Departments, or of the Judges, or of the officers of the Army, or Navy, it is one set of men fixing the compensation of another set; but, when the Legislature fixes its own compensation, it does an act which appears to be an exception to the general course of proceeding in the Government. The Constitution, from the necessity of the case, and not from its reason or propriety, has placed this power in our hands, and we must exercise it if we are to receive any compensation at all. But in the exercise of this power, I agree entirely with the sentiments first expressed yesterday by the SPEAKER, and since concurred in by several other members, that in this case, above all others, we ought to consult the opinions and wishes of our constituents. If these observations are well founded, the course which I have to pursue, is a very plain one. My constituents, I believe, are generally in favor of the old compensation. In this respect, my situation is somewhat different from that of the other members of this House. A respectable portion of the people I represent, have petitioned Congress against the law of the last session. That petition is the only one that has been presented to this House on the subject. It is true, it has been said in debate that the persons who sent that petition did not understand the law; but as it has not been shown why or wherefore they did not understand it, I presume I am still at liberty to believe that they did. Believing, then, that my constituents are in favor of Congress returning to the old compensation of six dollars per day, I shall vote the filling the blank with that sum.

The question was put on filling the blank (for the future daily compensation of the members) with nine dollars, and negatived.

The question was taken on filling the blank with eight dollars, and negatived, as follows: For the motion 60, against 98.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with six dollars (the old compensation) and decided in the affirmative, by the following vote: For the motion 84, against it 74.

So it was determined by the Committee (subject to the revision of the House) that the compensation be reduced to its old rate of six dollars per day.

Some other amendments were proposed, adopted, or rejected.

A motion was then made to amend the bill by striking out the whole bill, and inserting in lieu thereof, two sections, the one absolutely and simply repealing the compensation law; the other requiring that there shall be deducted from the amount received by each member during the past and present sessions of Congress, all the amount over and above what he would have received under the old compensation of six dollars per day.

Before this question was decided, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 16.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill, supplementary to "An act providing for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts due the United States;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Summers and John Allen; which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House, entitled "An act for the relief of William Haslett," with an amendment. They have also passed bills of the following titles: "An act for the relief of William Edwards," and "An act authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington; in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment to the bill for the relief of William Haslett was read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of William Edwards was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington," was read twice, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COMPENSATION LAW.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to repeal the act of the last session, fixing the compensation of the members of Congress; the substitute offered yesterday by Mr. RANDOLPH, first to repeal the act of the last session, and, secondly, to deduct from the pay of the members an amount equivalent to what they have received more than they would have been entitled to under the former pay of six dollars a day, being under consideration—

Mr. PARRIS, of Massachusetts, rose and observed, that he understood the Committee of the Whole House had agreed to fill the first blank in the bill under consideration, as reported by the select committee, with the sum of six dollars, and that by this bill, should it pass and become a law, members of Congress, instead of the sum allowed by the act of the last session, will be entitled to receive no greater rate of compensation than has been allowed to every Congress since the adoption of the Constitution. That having been disposed of, the subject under immediate consideration is the amendment offered by the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) By that amendment, it is proposed to deduct from the compensation to which members will be entitled the present session, a sum equal to the amount of the excess which they received the last, over the former daily pay; or, in other words, so to modify the law as that the pay of this Congress, either at the last or the present session, shall not exceed that of every former Congress. Sir, said Mr. P., it has been often asserted, in this debate, that public opinion does not require a repeal of the law of the last session; that the clamor which has been made relative to that law, has been merely the voice of faction, of newspaper editors, of noisy demagogues, of electioneering intrigue, and of those who were secretly rejoicing at the opportunity it afforded them of mounting the hobby-horse, and riding to our seats. It has been said, sir, that on this subject the most clamorous have uniformly been those who were most anxious for public preferment, and at the same time the least qualified; that, to attract public attention, to gain the feelings of the people, it had been only necessary for the demagogue to mount his hobby, denounce compensation, and cry out economy, without even a knowledge of the meaning of the former, or the worth of the latter. Sir, I cannot believe with honorable members who have made these assertions, that all this excitement has been artificial. For the honor of my country, for the character of the nation, I hope and still believe that there is sufficient of caution and of virtue in this people, to render them secure from all such attempts at excitement. So far as my knowledge has extended, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this House, there have been no such attempts. The people have been left to judge for themselves; they have inquired, they have examined, they have listened to arguments; they have formed their opinion with great deliberation, and have pronounced a verdict; nay, sir, have pronounced a solemn judgment, from which there can be no appeal. By that judgment, thus deliberately expressed, thus solemnly pronounced, I believe myself to be bound. Will honorable members doubt that our constituents call for a repeal of the law of the last session; that they have rendered this verdict; that they have pronounced this judgment? If so, permit me to refer them to the evidence—evidence which has been as conclusive to my mind as "proof from holy writ"—evidence which cannot be misunderstood, and which has, unfortunately, been brought home to the feelings of many a member of this House.

I take no pleasure in travelling through that evidence; it must bring to my recollection some of the most painful hours of my life; but, unpleasant as may be the task, it is my duty to add the information in my possession, in confirmation of what I believe to be public opinion; for, by public opinion, the policy and the expediency of this most unfortunate law must finally be tested. Although there may not have been so much of clamor in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, still, sir, there has been more of deliberation—of that kind of deliberation, too, which is neither likely to be rash in decision, or erroneous in result. And what is that result? Not that the passage of the law is evidence of corruption in those who gave it support; not that the members of this body have been so far forgetful of moral obligation as to have wilfully and intentionally legislated for their exclusive advantage, without reference to the public good. No, sir, they do not impute to us either want of integrity or impurity of motive; but while of those we are acquitted, we stand presented, I had almost said convicted, of indiscretion. Our clerks had scarcely carried the bill to the Senate, to solicit concurrence, before the alarm commenced. From private correspondence and public expression, I had the apprehensions which have since been confirmed, that the law we are now reviewing had better slumbered undisturbed on the table of the House. Nor has this dissatisfaction been confined merely to the limits of a single State in the East. What have been the indications in the West and the South? Sir, I well recollect the portentous storm that, during the last Summer, seemed to be gathering in the State so ably represented in part by the honorable member who introduced this law. The sentiments expressed on every public occasion, and in every possible manner in that State, seemed loudly to condemn the passage, and call for a repeal of the measure; expressions which, to be sure, in too many instances indicated their sources to have been a heated head or a corrupt heart; expressions, which not unfrequently savored more of the clamorous demagogue than of the prudent, deliberate politician. In a neighboring State, members were arraigned at the tribunal of the people, and required, as public servants, to give an account of their stewardships; and, with as little justice as mercy, unheard and undefended, made equally the subject of violent declamation and intemperate resolves. Will it be said that all this affords no evidence of public sentiment or of public disapprobation? I then call your recollection to the many sumptuous and splendid entertainments given to the honorable member who was so preeminently conspicuous, at the last session, in opposing this measure. Further, sir, even the grand inquests for the presentment of criminal offences in one of the States—a State far removed from that which I have the honor in part to represent—a State of whose laws I am ignorant, and with whose policy, except in one memorable case, which will long be remembered with sorrow by many an honest but unfortunate family, I am unacquainted, feeling so sensibly impressed with the high duties of their station, and desirous, as perchance most people seem lately to have been, of having some concern in great national affairs, could not refrain from embodying their sentiments, and presenting them at the bar of the people. Such presentments, however respectable might have been the source from which they emanated, with whatever aggravations they may have stated the offence, could to be sure have little effect upon those against whom they were directed. Is all this nothing but the voice of faction, the effect of clamorous, designing demagogues? Will gentlemen say that this burst of disapprobation from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the most remote settlements on the frontier, speaks nothing of the real sentiments of the people? No, sir, it does speak, and loudly, too, in a voice that cannot be misunderstood, in a manner that must and ought to be respected; respected, because it promulgates the will, and the deliberate will, of the sovereign and paramount authority of this country. No member in this House could be less disposed than myself to listen to the clamours of the restless, the ambitious, and the impatient for power. Excitements from these sources, raised by such artifice, as was stated a few days since, by the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) to have been made use of to alarm the fears, and mislead the judgment of the people in that State, will ever be allayed by reflection; and the ambitious demagogue, who on such hobbies mounts in the whirlwind and rides in the storm, will sometimes, as fortunately for the country as unfortunately for himself, be crushed in the tempest he had contributed to produce. I ought, said Mr. P., to mention one other proof of the deliberate opinion of the public—the sentiments of many of the States, as expressed by their Legislatures. On what subjects have the State Legislatures heretofore given instructions to their Senators, and made requests of their Representatives? On questions considered as of trivial consequence to the people? No; never, except in relation to questions of high importance in principle, and doubtful in policy. In such cases, the sentiments of State Legislatures have been frequently expressed to members of this House. The Legislature of Massachusetts, at a recent session, following the example, has by resolution requested the Representatives from that Commonwealth to use their influence to effect a repeal of the law now under discussion. I have gone thus far for the purpose of ascertaining what on this subject is the public opinion; and the result is to my mind perfectly satisfactory, that it not only solicits, but absolutely demands a repeal of the law. In what other way can public sentiment be collected, except from public expression? and I put it to those who deny that this is the deliberate sentiment of the people, to prove that it is not so. If in favor of the war, or any other prominent measure of this Government, there had been one-half the excitement with which the people have been almost convulsed during the last Summer on this subject, my word for it, no one would have doubted the opinion of the people. If, instead of calling upon us to repeal the law of the last session, the Legislatures of the several States had passed resolutions approving its passage and sanctioning its principles, I doubt, if instead of being disposed to nail the resolutions to the counter as base and uncurrent coin, we should not have been more likely to have entered them on our journals.

With a copy of the resolutions passed under all the forms of legislation, in the State of Massachusetts, I have been furnished. To such a request, proceeding from a body entitled to respect, composed of men, many of whom I know to be of high-minded and honorable feelings, with some of whom I have been associated in times when a coincidence of sentiment and exertion could not fail to produce and confirm the strongest attachments—to such a request, I feel myself bound to give great consideration. I am not willing, as one of my honorable colleagues professes to be, to nail it to the counter as the merchant does his bad money, without further examination, because I suspect it contains nothing counterfeit; it may be a true bill; it may express what some seem so unwilling to believe, the wishes of the people. No, sir, I am disposed to give it further examination, and ascertain, if possible, whether it be counterfeit or whether it be genuine.

Chosen, as the members from that State are, by districts, representing more especially the interests and the sentiments of the thirty-five thousand immediate constituents by whom they are elected, the individual may sometimes be requested by the whole to sanction measures which his district would oppose. Situated as is the

H. OF R.

State to which I have just alluded, it might frequently happen, it has frequently happened. In such a case, there could be no doubt. Instructions and requests, requiring a member to use his influence to effect measures which he conscientiously believed to be wrong, and which his immediate constituents believed to be wrong, ought not to be obeyed, ought not to be listened to; but, when those instructions and requests coincide with the wishes of his more immediate constituents, of those by whom he was elected, and for whom he acts, the course is plain; there remains but one alternative, compliance or resignation.

On great Constitutional questions, I hold it to be the duty of a Representative to receive instructions from no man or body of men; I mean those questions, wherein the Constitutional and chartered rights of the Government and the people are concerned. In forming a decision on such subjects, I am under an obligation paramount to all that man can impose. Having, in the presence of that Being who "will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain," solemnly sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, my own judgment must be my guide. In discharging so much of the duties imposed by that obligation, as prevents its violation, it is not for man to dictate, but for the conscience and judgment to direct. If, unfortunately, the judgment be erroneous, the same instrument has prescribed the mode of correcting the error. Far different is the case in all questions of mere policy. From the people, we first derive the power of legislation; it is, or ought to be for their benefit, that we are clothed with that power; on them the laws we enact are to have effect, and to them we are accountable for the use of the trust they have reposed in us. On all the usual subjects of legislation, the people have a right to be heard; say what we may, they will be heard, and not only heard, but they will be obeyed. With them resides the sovereign power, with them the physical strength. If the law is so universally considered as objectionable, and the public expression of disapprobation is to have effect, what ought to be done? Adopt the amendments proposed by the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) Repeal the law of the last session, to take effect from the day when it passed; obliterate it from our statute book, and offer it a sacrifice to appease the indignation of this people; deduct from the amount of pay received by the members during the last and the present session, so much as the same shall have exceeded the former rate of compensation. If we move at all, I go to the extent; adopt some principle for our guide; either do nothing, or do all that is required.

Why should we hesitate? there ought to be nothing of feeling on this subject, there most certainly should be nothing like reluctance. The passage of the law of the last session has never been attributed to corrupt motives; the members of this House, I trust, sir, are above even the suspicion of corruption. Shall we not incur that suspicion, if, having reduced the compensation to the former standard for the next Congress, we refuse to reduce it for ourselves? I will never accept, for myself, what I am not willing to allow to others for similar services; I will never retain what has given rise to the murmurs of the people. In making these observations, it should be understood that I am not under the influence of any instructions from my immediate constituents. As a member of the present Congress, I have received no instructions from them, either express or implied; neither am I under the influence of any pledge; but where is the member, who on this subject can be ignorant of the wishes of his constituents? The storm has beaten as severely on me as on any of my associates in this House, and if after having received the strong proof of the continued confidence of those whom I here represent, I could turn a deaf ear to their solicitations, it would be a species of the most palpable ingratitude. Sir, one word as to the effect of yielding to the public voice. It will derogate nothing from the character of this body. It will inspire the people with new confidence in this Government. The strength of a Republic depends on the attachment of its members. How is that attachment to be preserved, how confirmed? Surely, not by the most obstinate adherence to unpopular measures, not by placing the Government in array against the nation. Often is the most determinate British administration literally found to yield to the demands of that people. But permit me to say, that of all subjects, the one now under discussion, would, from its peculiar nature, seem to be the last upon which we should be tenacious of opinion.

Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York, said, it was unpleasant for him to detail his own history, but as some of the speeches which had been delivered on this subject, might be construed into an effort at electioneering, he trusted he might be indulged in saying, what was well known to his colleagues, that he declined being a candidate for member of Congress at the last election. My constituents, however, said Mr. C., contrary to my expectations, have again returned me as a member of this House. I assure you, sir, I have no wish to continue in any public situation. It is my desire and determination, ere long, to return to the practice of my profession, and to discharge the various duties which devolve upon me, to my family and to society. I look forward, with pleasure, to the period when official responsibility shall no longer be attached to my character. I mention these circumstances, sir, to show that I am not actuated upon this occasion, from mere motives of popular favor. When the compensation law, as it is called, which we are now about to repeal, was under consideration, I thought it was a subject upon which intelligent and virtuous men might fairly entertain an honest difference of opinion. Although, sir, I was opposed to the law, and of course differed in opinion upon this subject with its advocates, I have never withdrawn from them my respect and friendship. I have often said, that the compensation law was supported, and its benefits received by men far greater and better than myself; men whose talents I admired, and whose virtues I revered. Sir, this subject might have received a correct and just disposition in tranquillity and friendship. It involves no great intrinsic difficulty. I have witnessed with regret, the extreme sensibility and excitement manifested in the course of the discussion. Expressions have escaped a gentleman, wounding to my feelings, and to the moral sense and dignity of the Committee. A slander has been cast, by some persons, upon the good people of the United States, as possessing infidelity and laxity of moral principle. Republicanism and infidelity have been represented as inseparable companions; but, sir, our religious history repels this unfounded imputation. This Republic is the soil, where, in my apprehension, refined morality and undefiled religion will flourish to the latest ages. I hope the character of our debates will not militate against this consoling idea. Is it possible, sir, that the good people who crowd our gallery, have been constrained to hear language uttered upon this floor, calculated to awaken in their bosoms the mingled emotions of pity, astonishment, and disgust! But, sir, to return to the subject more immediately under consideration. In this Government, all authority is derived from the people. They are the repository of power, and the fountain of honor. From them we have received our official elevation. We are their public agents; and to them we are responsible for our conduct. In short, sir, I hold that the people have a right to instruct their Representatives; and that it is our duty to obey, under certain qualifications, the voice of our constituents. To the Governor of the Universe, we are under obligations, paramount to any which we can owe to man. Should the instructions of my constituents, therefore, conflict with the Constitution, or with my ideas of moral propriety, (an event which I by no means anticipate,) I should not hesitate how to act. Only two alternatives would be presented to my choice; to disregard their instructions, or to resign my seat in this honorable body. As to public sentiment and feeling on the compensation law, I can only add my testimony in favor of the declaration of honorable members, who have assured you that it is generally disapproved and condemned.

Mr. Chairman, I have no ambition to detain you by repeating narratives and arguments which have been afforded by gentlemen, founded on the manifestation of public opinion, strongly evincing the propriety of repealing this offensive law. I will only say, that in the district in which I have the happiness to reside, the effect of the compensation law was electrical. It aroused into active opposition, not only those who had been habitually engaged in politics, but also many who had seldom if ever been seen before on the political theatre. It is high time, then, that this law, which has received such universal denunciation, should be repealed. I should have been happy to have acted upon this subject earlier in the session. The people are undoubtedly opposed to that part of the law which fixes the mode of our compensation, but more especially to the amount we are authorized to receive. Sir, repeal the law, reduce our wages to the old standard of six dollars per day, and they will be satisfied. They generally think this compensation adequate.—Upon this point some of us entertain a different opinion. I am disposed, however, to bow to the public will, so clearly expressed on this occasion, and to try the consequence. But we are called upon by gentlemen to refund a part of the money which we have received under the compensation law. This is taking higher ground than I have seen taken in the newspapers, or than I have anywhere heard in conversation. The law was not corruptly procured. It was passed in this House upon mature deliberation, and received the solemn sanction of all branches of the Government. I never conceived it unjust or improper in me to receive the amount of compensation thus afforded. I have never felt any compunctious visitings of conscience for this part of my conduct. When this shall be the case, I hope I may be faithful to manifest a duty. Conceiving then, sir, that I am neither called upon by the voice of my constituents, or of justice, to refund any part of the money conferred on me by the compensation law, I shall vote accordingly. Let other gentlemen follow the dictates of their own enlightened reason and conscience in the decision of this question.

I know it has been said that the course I advocated would drive men of talents, learning, and integrity, from the National Councils. Upon this argument, I do not at present hazard an opinion; but I will say, that if an evil of this kind should be produced and ascertained, in the good sense and virtue of the community it would find its corrective. The people of the United States are too well informed; they too strongly desire their own prosperity and happiness to suffer a consequence of this description long to exist without applying the appropriate remedy.

There is certainly one aspect in which this subject can be viewed, which augurs well for the purity and stability of our republican institutions. It demonstrates that the people are jealous of what they deem to be their rights; that they are watchful over the conduct of their public agents. On this subject, however, some think they have mistaken the true path of interest. Whether this is the fact time will disclose. Our experience on this subject will, moreover, add another proof of the excellency of the form of our Government. It will show that the people, without wading through blood and slaughter, by resorting to Revolutionary measures, have it in their power, in the exercise of the elective franchise, to abrogate what they conceive to be unjust or oppressive laws, and to substitute others, in their opinion, more consonant to the Constitution and the principles of rational liberty.

Mr. HULBERT, of Massachusetts, said, less than one year ago, after long discussion and mature deliberation, we passed the law which is now in review before us. There does not now exist a single objection against the measure worthy of notice, which was not then repeatedly and vehemently urged; nor was there one argument which could then be used in favor of the passage of the law which may not at this time, with greater force, be brought against its repeal. Shall we not then abide by what we have done? Shall the senseless clamor which we have heard make us give up our opinion and oppose the dictates of our own consciences? Shall we now repeal this law which we so lately passed, and which we still deem essential to our country's good? No, it would be a gross violation of our public duty, and a cruel act of self degradation. To use the language of Burke, it would be touching the bottom of humiliation; our lead would be brought up covered with mud.

Sir, the adoption of the propositions now before us would surely hang us on one of the horns of this dilemma. We must either confess ourselves guilty of extreme rashness in the vote we gave last session, or of cowardice in the one we now give.

I cannot, said Mr. H., refrain from expressing my astonishment, that a motion to repeal this law should have come from the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) At the last session he not only voted for the law, but the utmost powers of his wit and eloquence were exerted to procure its passage; and even at this session he has declared his mistaken confidence in the justice and propriety of the measure, and has poured a torrent of ridicule upon the opposition to it. But now that honorable gentleman is not contended with moving the repeal of the law; no, he goes a giant's stride beyond that; he proposes that we should be compelled to restore to the Treasury whatever we may have received beyond the amount of the former compensation. How these propositions can be consistent with the course heretofore taken by him, I will leave to the great ingenuity of that gentleman to show; for I must acknowledge that it is far beyond my power. Sir, the honorable gentleman has repeatedly declared, that, if he had voted against the passage of the law, he would sooner have thrust his hand into his neighbor's pocket and purloined his money, than to have taken from the Treasury one cent beyond the old allowance of six dollars per day. You will permit me, sir, to say, that, since I gave my vote for the law, I would as soon confess myself guilty of theft and robbery, as to vote for the last amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman. We have received nothing more than what a law constitutionally passed—a law which the mover of this amendment still declares to be just and righteous—gave us. Why, then, refund the money? I do not care for the pitiful sum in question; no, I would not contend a moment for that. But I will contend for principle, for consistency. I remember being present in my early youth when a stranger entered the room, and, reminding the head of the family of a theft which had been committed upon his goods many years before that time, confessed, with tears in his eyes, that he was the thief. He declared that he had repented of his crime, and had come to make restitution, which he faithfully did to the utmost farthing. Sir, the conduct of that man I have always admired, and if, like him, I could consider myself a felon, I would follow his example: I would confess my guilt, and hasten to make restitution to the people; I would vote for the proposed amendment. But I have no consciousness of guilt, and therefore I will make no confession. I will abide by what I have done. Sir, I have seen in newspapers stories of thieves, who, having swallowed the money they had stolen, had emetics forced down their throats to compel them to disgorge their ill-gotten gains. I hope that that process did not suggest to the gentleman the proposition he has made.

Can it be possible that the honorable gentleman really wishes the repeal of this law? No, he shakes his head—he denies it. I am left, then, to conjecture the object he has in view. Sure I am that no unworthy motive can govern him. He is as much above what he can think dishonorable conduct, as the sublimest flight of the eagle is above the creeping reptile.

Mr. Chairman, I well remember that the proposition for raising the compensation of members of Congress was first suggested to me by my honorable friend from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON.) He requested my opinion as to the propriety of the measure. After taking time to deliberate on the subject, I assured him that I approved of his plan, and would give it my cordial support. I rejoiced that the motion would come from one who was above all suspicion of mean and sordid views—one who had proved his patriotism, and was then bleeding with the wounds he had received in the service of his country. Sir, I was faithful to my promise. I gave him all the support I could: I gave him my vote, and I rejoiced with him when the law was passed; for I thought it essential to the public good. With what pleasure did I see that honorable gentleman rise in his seat, a few days since, in defence of the law! I thought it due to himself and his friends that he should defend the measure he had originated. I listened to his animated and powerful argument, and it strengthened and confirmed the opinion I had adopted. But with what surprise and regret did I hear him concluding his speech with a motion to repeal or modify the law he had so nobly defended! I cannot deny that it gave me pain.

You will allow me, sir, to advert to the report of the committee which has been made upon this subject. That report is manifestly the production of great talents. It bears on every page the stamp of powerful intellect. It is an unanswerable argument in support of the present law, and yet it concludes by recommending its repeal! Sir, the speech of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, and the report I have mentioned, remind me of war elephants, which sometimes in the heat and confusion of battle turn from the enemy and trample down their owners.

Sir, what objections have been made against this law? Is the present compensation too great? Few, very few, have made the assertion. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DESHA,) it must be admitted, has taken that ground, and has declared that the old allowance of six dollars per day was sufficiently high. He has made a minute calculation of the expenses, which he thinks would reasonably be incurred by attending a session of five months, and concludes that a member might carry home to his family about four hundred and fifty dollars. I know that that honorable gentleman is incapable of stating anything which he does not think perfectly correct, and no one will doubt that he lives in this city in a style becoming a gentleman. But if he can save the sum he names, he surely must have an art in managing his affairs which very few of us possess. Admitting, however, the accuracy of his statement, I would not wish for a stronger argument to show, that the late compensation was quite insufficient. It would give us only four hundred and fifty dollars, to defray all the expenses of our families for five months, and to compensate us for our abandonment of our professions or occupations, and the consequent derangement of our private affairs. Even the gentleman himself, on reflection, seemed startled at his own argument, and hastened from it, to tell us how much honor we receive by being members of Congress. Honor, sir! are we chamelions, that we can live on air? I must acknowledge that I fear we shall prove ourselves rather too much like those strange animals; for if we now repeal this law, we shall prove at least that we can change our opinions quite as easily as they can change their colors. But, if we can live on honor, will it feed and clothe our families? No, sir, while we are strutting here, inflated with honor, they may be freezing and starving at home. And you will allow me, sir, to say, that he who can forget his wife and children, although he may have a sound head, must have a rotten heart, and is unfit for a legislator.

I have never seen the objection to the amount of compensation placed in a stronger point of view, than has been done by an honorable gentleman, who lately resigned his seat on this floor, (Mr. Mayrant, of South Carolina.) In his letter of resignation, he says, the present compensation law opens the door of Congress to virtue and talents, and costs his constituents, beyond what they formerly paid, less than one cent and one-fourth of a cent each, per year.

It has ever been my opinion, that the allowance to members of Congress should be such, as would draw into the councils of the nation men of distinguished talents and information, from all parts of the Union, whether rich or poor. Nothing can be more important to the people, than that their Representatives should be men of that description, and that they should be placed above temptation to abandon their seats for offices in the gift of the Executive, or for lucrative employments in private life. Trace the subject to the commencement of our Government, and how many members of both branches of the Legislature do we find resigning their seats, because they cannot endure the sacrifice which their situation requires of them? This causes a constant succession of new and inexperienced members; distracts the councils of the nation, and forbids the hope of the establishment of a broad and lasting system of policy, which shall look to the permanent prosperity and glory of the country.

Sir, I will dwell no longer on this point. I am confident that the cool and deliberate opinion of the people will be, that the compensation is not too high.

An objection which has been very strenuously urged against the law, is this, that the compensation should have been an allowance per day, and not a salary. I have ever considered the contest on this point as a mere dispute about words. Surely it makes no difference with the Treasury, whether the fifteen hundred dollars, to be taken from it, be received in the former or the latter mode. The amount which the people have to pay, is the same; and it is no high compliment to their understanding, to suppose that they regard the form, and not the substance of things. Why should there be anything so frightful in the idea of a salary? Sir, the President of the United States receives a salary. So does the Vice President, who presides over the highest Legislative branch of the Government. Look throughout the government of the Union, and that of the individual States, and how frequent, how common are salaried officers! Are not the judges of our highest courts of that description? I know it will be answered, and truly, that the judges are obliged to spend the whole of the year in courts, in the study of the laws, and otherwise in the performance of their high duties. And what, sir, is the duty of a member of Congress? Will we have fully performed it by having faithfully attended the several sessions? No, sir; he who legislates for eight millions of people; he to whose care the destinies of the nation are in a considerable degree committed, should keep his eye steadily fixed on the public weal—should consider himself constantly in the service of his country. There cannot, then, be any incongruity in the ideas of legislator and salary.

It is amusing to notice upon what opposite grounds this mode of compensation has been denounced. The Legislature of one of the States has resolved that it was beneath our dignity to make ourselves salaried officers; that is to say, it was beneath our dignity to place ourselves on a level in that respect, with the President of the United States. At the same time, meetings of patriots in other parts of the country were as stoutly resolving, that we had taken to ourselves too much consequence, and had exalted ourselves quite too high. Sir, I cannot think that the opposition to the mode of compensation is supported by any substantial reason. It appears to me to be, generally, the last resort of those who had determined to raise a clamor against the law, at all events, and who, being forced to admit that the present compensation is not too high, seized on this objection, in the true spirit of Goldsmith's schoolmaster, that, even though vanquished, they might argue still.

Mr. Chairman, it has been repeatedly asserted, that it is indelicate and improper for members of Congress to determine their own compensation. Sir, there is a perfect, and I hope it will be an entirely satisfactory answer to this objection. When the original draught of the Constitution, as made by the Convention, was proposed to the people for adoption, it contained an article expressly prohibiting Congress from passing any law for raising the compensation of its own members, which should take effect before an election should have intervened. This article was rejected, and left out of the Constitution. The people, then, have decided the question. They have determined that it is proper for us to fix our own compensation: and, sir, having made up our minds to raise the allowance, it would have been a false delicacy an affected disregard of self-interest, not to have embraced in the provision the present Congress.

But it is said that the voice of the people commands the repeal of this law. Sir, I deny the fact. Gentlemen have mistaken the clamor of newspapers, and the noise of party spirit, and factious demagogues, for the voice of the nation. No one, I trust, entertains a higher respect for the cool and deliberate opinions of the people, than I do. But I have heard no such opinion on this subject.

The first clamor against this law, which I remember to have heard, and to have thought worthy of notice, was raised in the greatest commercial city in the Union. An important election was about to take place. A meeting of one of the parties was called, at which, resolutions were passed, denouncing in bitter terms the compensation law, and charging it to the account of their political opponents. This immediately produced violent recrimination, and the charge was furiously retorted. Sir, the accusation on both sides was unjust. The compensation law was no party measure. It, however, soon became fashionable in various parts of the Union, for the great political parties to attack each other with this formidable weapon. Federal and Democratic demagogues contended who should be foremost and loudest in denouncing the compensation men: the artillery of the press was opened upon us; Legislatures attacked us with resolves; grand juries presented us; and mobs hung us—in effigy!

This, sir, is the voice of the people, which we are so solemnly bound to obey, and which has spread such consternation within these walls!

My honorable friend (Mr. PARRIS) has told the Committee that he now stands presented by a grand jury, for having voted for the compensation law last session; he has declared, that it is the only time in his life he has been in that sad predicament, and he appears to be much agitated on the subject. Sir, I do not wish to add to the afflictions of my honorable friend; but I must remind him, that it is not the only time he has been thus unkindly noticed by a grand jury. He stands presented for attending a caucus last Winter in this city, for the nomination of a candidate for President. But I beg my colleague not to be too much alarmed. I am sure he would, on a fair and impartial trial, be acquitted of both those charges. But should he now, with no better reasons than he has yet offered, vote to repeal the law, which he so lately zealously supported, he would richly deserve to be indicted for that offence, and I am confident that there could not be empanelled in this country an honest jury who would not find him guilty.

Since grand juries have been brought into this debate by my colleague, to prove that the voice of the people is against this law, I must say, that I recollect only two who have acted on this subject. One of those grand inquests in a northern State (Vermont) presented, as a great grievance, that we raised our compensation at a time when an inauspicious season threatened, want and famine. Sir, when we passed the law that State was, as usual, one hundred feet, be the same more or less, under snow! and yet the evil that threatened those wise men, at the time they made the presentment, was a drought! Another grand jury, in Georgia, placed in a very singular predicament some of the Representatives of that State, whom I now see in their seats. Although those honorable gentlemen voted with all their might against the law, yet they were presented because they did, on other subjects, make long, laborious, and tedious speeches, and also because they did not make like speeches against the compensation law.

Mr. Chairman, this voice of the people has produced one very wonderful effect. It has made my honorable friend (Mr. PARRIS) fall most desperately in love with the Legislature of Massachusetts. This I rejoice to learn, and I hope he will prove no fickle lover. For years past that gentleman has been quarrelling with that Legislature; but there can be no doubt that his reconciliation and attachment are unfeigned, for he has given the strongest proofs of their sincerity. He has informed the Committee that he has received certain resolves from that Legislature, requesting him to vote for the repeal of the compensation law; and that, although he voted for that law last session, and then thought it a just and necessary measure, and still thinks so, yet he feels himself bound to obey the request he has received, and shall cheerfully give up his own opinion. Do the Committee wish for any further evidence of his sincere devotion? They will then do my colleague the justice to recollect, that he never even named the Legislature, without making a very low and reverential bow.

Sir, I too have received copies of certain late proceedings of the Legislature of Massachusetts. That honorable body has been pleased to resolve that the compensation law, passed last session, "is an innovation upon the custom, and not congenial with the Republican principles of our Government," and has requested me, among others, to use my influence to effect its repeal. I will not obey the request. I will vote against the repeal, and will surely oppose it with the little influence I may have. My judgment and my conscience plainly point out to me that course. My opinion has been deliberately formed—it is fixed, but not as in a frost; I will not give it up to any man, or body of men, on earth.

H. OF R.

Compensation Law.

JANUARY, 1817.

As long as memory shall hold a seat in my brain, I shall be warmly attached to Massachusetts. It is the land of my nativity. There I first drew my breath, and there are the objects of my fondest affections. I am proud of it as the birth-place of American freedom. There streamed the first blood that sealed and sanctified our independence, and there, I trust, will stream the last in its defence. I cannot, however, fail to express my regret, that the Legislature of that great and powerful Commonwealth should have thought fit to interfere in a concern so trifling and unimportant to the interests of that State. It was beneath their dignity. The agitation of that great body, on this little subject, resembles “—— ocean into tempest wrought,

To waft a feather, or to drown a fly.”

If State governments have any right to interfere with the doings of Congress, surely that right should be exercised only on highly momentous occasions. And what is the question which originated the resolutions I have received? One not only of little importance to the State from which they came, but on which, in my opinion, it was wholly inexpedient, if not absolutely unlawful, for the Legislature of that State to act. Sir, under the Old Confederation, each State had the right to fix the compensation of its own members of Congress; but when the present Constitution was adopted, that right was taken from the individual States and given to Congress exclusively. Why? Because it was thought proper that the Representatives of all the States should have an equal compensation, and because it was known that members of Congress would be best qualified to judge of the expenses and the sacrifices which their situation would require, and, of course, to determine what would be a reasonable allowance.

Sir, the resolutions which I have received from Massachusetts, are not accompanied by a single reason to recommend them. The request is a naked one. If the Legislature had any good reasons to offer, as guides for my conduct, surely they would not have been so unkind as to keep them back. I am therefore bound to believe they had none. “An innovation upon the custom, and not congenial with the Republican principles of our Government!” The alphabet, ground in a pepper-mill, would convey to me as distinct an idea as these words do—they mean anything—they mean nothing.

It has been fashionable, during this debate, while talking about the voice of the people, for gentlemen to state to the Committee their experience in relation to this ill-fated law. I must follow the fashion; but I will despatch the topic in a few words. On my return home, last Spring, I gave due notice to my constituents that I voted for the compensation law, and that I never would vote for its repeal. And yet, Mr. Chairman, strange as it may seem to some honorable gentlemen, a convention of my district, very numerously attended, unanimously nominated me again for their candidate, and I unanimously declined. Such is my experience.

Sir, a great statesman has told us that nothing is so rash as fear. Let us take care that in legislating on this subject we are not influenced by a factious clamor, taking it for an expression of the real sentiments of the nation. I am confident that the settled opinion of the American people will sanction what we have done.

Among the many disastrous effects which the repeal of this law, if it take place, will produce, there is one peculiarly to be dreaded. It will encourage a mean and sordid spirit in our legislation—a spirit which I am sorry to say is already quite too prevalent. Its baneful influence is constantly felt. It forces us to abandon the best interests of the nation. Even the sacred advice of WASHINGTON must be disregarded or neglected. Let us propose to fortify our country, “that in time of peace we may be prepared for war;” let us offer any great scheme of internal improvement, and we are sure to have our ears stunned with the cry of economy! economy!! Sir, I hate that word. It once conveyed the idea of a noble virtue; it meant the safe and prudent management of our affairs; it now signifies parsimony and meanness. It is the magic word in the mouth of demagogues, by which the people are charmed out of their senses, and cheated out of their best rights. It is a siroc blast in the political world; it prostrates the strength, and withers all the energies of our country.

Sir, if we reduce the compensation to what it was before the passage of this law, we may soon witness attempts to sink it still lower. No one can tell where the struggle for popularity will end. A contest for a seat in Congress will be like what the jockies call a scrub race, which is so contrived, that the slowest and meanest horse is always sure to win the stake. Yes, sir, men will fill your Hall of Legislation, who will be as unfit to make laws, as an ass is to teach algebra.

Mr. Chairman, I have but few words to add. I deliberately gave my vote for the law in question; I thought it a just and necessary measure. I have reviewed the subject, and am entirely satisfied with what I have done. I will not look up to the weathercock of popularity, to see which way the gale is blowing. Not having changed my opinion, I will not change my vote. If the clamor of demagogues shall not cease; if the storms of faction shall continue to rage, I have only to feel conscious that I have done my duty, and to say, with King Lear, “blow winds, and crack your cheeks.”

Mr. FORSYTH said, he did not expect, after the serious declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that during the remainder of his political life he should not offer any proposition to the House, to hear so soon, from that quarter, an amendment proposed of such a decisive character.

[Mr. RANDOLPH explained, that he did not mean

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

to say he should introduce no amendments: he spoke only of original propositions.]

Mr. F. did not understand the declaration to have had any such limitation. He was not, however, about to find fault with this change or forgetfulness of the resolution previously announced; he was about to congratulate the House and the country, that some benefit was hereafter to be derived from the gentleman's information and experience, in the management of the public business. From the nature of the amendment, and from the introductory remarks to it, it was obvious that the object was to make the repealing law so obnoxious as to endanger its final adoption.

[Mr. R. was sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Georgia again, but his object was to induce the House to act correctly; this could be done by one of two modes—preserving the old law, or adopting his amendment.]

Mr. FORSYTH was glad to be corrected. He had supposed, that in arguing from the effect, to ascertain the motive of the proposed amendment, he was pursuing a fair course of reasoning, and one calculated to lead him to the truth. As the gentleman from Virginia had stated now his view so definitely, he should not impute to him the design to produce an effect which would nevertheless follow the success of his amendment. The question before the Committee is now confined to the first section of the amendment, and to this he should confine himself. This section proposes a simple and unconditional repeal of the act of the last session. Of the success of this motion, there was no doubt. More mature reflection on the effect of the popular sentiment, combined to insure this result. For his own part, his opinions on this subject had undergone no change. He had been at the last session opposed to the law, which was unfortunately passed; and he was, of course, for the same, and for no other reason, in favor of its repeal. When that subject was under consideration, he had stated that he was not opposed to the act because it increased the amount of compensation. It was because it sought to reach a justifiable end by improper and unjustifiable means. He should not attempt to say anything about the adequacy of this or that sum. A question of amount did not enter into the present inquiry. When that question came regularly into view he should give his vote upon the subject, as upon all others, according to the result of his experience and his judgment.

What, Mr. F. asked, was there to recommend the law which is proposed to be repealed? Compared with the old system, it was inferior in every respect but one—the amount of compensation. Every gentleman who has addressed you in favor of the present law, has confined himself to remarks, intended to show the necessity of an increase of pay, to the important political effects likely to arise from raising Legislative compensation to something like a level with the emoluments of Executive officers. Not one syllable has been uttered in favor of the change from a daily to an annual allowance. Was it because it was indefensible, or did gentlemen intend to rest this change upon the arguments of the last session? An increase of compensation is certainly justifiable and proper; but the admission of this fact does not assist the advocates of the new mode, unless the idea is resorted to, that it was necessary to change the manner, in order to conceal the increase. Mr. F. said, that in order to render compensation equitably proportioned to the service performed, some rule must be fixed. In the payment for legislative, as of all other services, you must calculate either the quality, or the quantity, of the service, or the time which is required for its performance. The two first afford no safe foundation for a general regulation. You must adhere to the latter if you desire to graduate the compensation either to the amount of expense incurred, or the sacrifices made in performing the duties required. It must be obvious, that, by the present law, the compensation was unnecessarily great if the sessions of Congress should be continued but two or three months in the year; and if the public exigency should require a continued session of nine or twelve months, it was equally obvious that it was shamefully insufficient. Why, then, abandon the ordinary, the established, and well-settled rule, for this obnoxious novelty? When the new system was adopted, Mr. F. said he recollected well the only argument offered in its favor—he would correct his phrase—he would not say the only argument, although it was the only one he remembered to have been used—but he would say the prominent argument, upon which its advocates rested, was, that it was necessary to change the mode, in order to shorten the sessions, and to expedite the public business. Mr. F. considered this argument as altogether unfounded, and the fruitful source of all the clamor and excitement which had been produced by this measure. Was it not announcing to the people, that those who used it, believed that a sufficient number of the members of the House were governed by the most despicable petty pecuniary motives to prolong the sessions of Congress, and protract the public business? Had gentlemen any right to complain? Could they feel any surprise, that, governed by a similar mode of reasoning, their own conduct should be assailed by the people, and the vilest motives imputed to them? Mr. F. said, he was very far from justifying the popular clamor on this subject; it had been excited to an unwarrantable height, not justified by the occasion, and on a point not sufficiently important to make it worthy of the sensation it had produced. But he was desirous to show gentlemen that the fault lay in some measure, at their own doors. In common with other members from Georgia, he had been assailed by those who had resentments to satiate, or friendships to gratify. The attacks upon him, from accidental causes, had not been successful. When it should be his misfortune (if indeed it could be called a misfortune to be divorced from public life) of being no longer an acceptable Representative of the people of Georgia, he should endeavor to forget everything but the confidence which had been reposed in him, and shut his eye upon the unkindness of a sentence, which, like that passed upon his colleagues, he trusted he should not deserve.

But, Mr. F. said, he was wandering from the point. He certainly did not, and could not believe, that any member of that House was so destitute of common decency and common honesty as to delay public business from a paltry pecuniary motive. Admitting, however, the argument to be justly found, it affords a powerful reason against the new mode; for if a trifling and insufficient per diem affords temptation to a dereliction of duty, too strong to be withstood by all, and leads to an unnecessary delay of business, an annual compensation, which is diminished by the duration of the session, will produce the opposite effect—the curtailment of the sessions and the neglect of public business. Mr. F. said he left it to gentlemen to estimate the difference between the lengthened session with the enactment, and the shortened session with the neglect of necessary laws. He had already seen much evil growing out of the change. He desired to be understood, that he did not impute to gentlemen a motive more unworthy than the one he distinctly announced. It seemed to him, that in order to accomplish their prediction on this point; in order to make the fact correspond with the prophecy, the last session of Congress had been hurried to its close. Many laws of general and vital importance had been left unconsidered, and the table of the Speaker had been crowded with the private acts. If his memory was accurate, forty had been passed in one day. Mr. F. said, he did not object to the relief of individuals when entitled to the interference of the House, but he had always supposed that the general ought always to have precedence of partial relief, however meritorious the object and just his title to favor. He apprehended similar evils from a continuance of the present law; if not in the interference to general laws, at least from the wholesale dealing in private acts. It had been asked, very triumphantly, why these arguments were not urged at the last session of Congress; how it happened that this burning zeal against the act, had not blazed out at the time of its adoption. Mr. F. asked if they had not been urged; were they not remembered? That the usual length and labor of investigation had not been devoted to this subject, was true, for the reasons he would remind gentlemen of certain facts which seem to have been forgotten. The compensation bill was the only one of any interest pushed through the Committee of the whole House, and ordered to a third reading in a single day. All motions to amend were rejected; for the Committee to rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again, met with the same fate. The bantling, rickety as it is, was not suffered to receive a corset to press it into a decent shape. The House refused repeated propositions to adjourn, and continued its sittings until the bill was ordered to be engrossed. The whole day on which it passed was occupied in the discussion of its merits, and although the debate was but partially sketched in the public prints, and none of the proceedings in the Committee of the Whole ever appeared before the public, there was quite as much said against as in favor of the measure. Mr. F. did not speak of the quantity of words spoken, or to the wit, raillery, and allusion used, but simply of the arguments which had been advanced by those favorable and hostile to the measure. He thought he had some reason to complain, not of the cause, but of the effect of the partial report of the proceedings on this subject. What he had said or proposed was in itself of very little consequence, and certainly he felt no particular interest in having it laid before the people; but it had been made a source of animadversion and calumny in the States of whose representation he formed a part. And it was the sole circumstance he had to regret. Could he have foreseen all the clamor and excitement that had been produced, he would have acted and spoken precisely as he had done, taking care that what had been said by him should have found its way in the ordinary channel to the people. He had received a very broad hint that he had not fulfilled the wishes and expectations of his constituents, but consoled himself with the idea that his conduct had not been properly understood. The people of Georgia had given him no instructions—for which he was duly thankful. He trusted that they would always leave him unshackled to pursue what he certainly should pursue, whether attempted to be shackled or not, the line of conduct his own judgment marked out for the interest, the happiness, and the honor of the people. God forbid he should ever live to choose between the obligations of duty and those of gratitude.

Mr. F. said he had entered somewhat into the merits of the question before the Committee, to render it unnecessary for him again to say anything on this subject; but his chief object in rising, was to reply to some remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PARRIS,) on the grand jury of Georgia. Mr. F. said he was not the advocate of the grand jury, or the justifier of their opinions. He could not believe that their opinions were either liberal or just, without admitting that he himself was censurable, since the same grand jury had found fault with him among others. But this was a matter of local concern, and he had hoped that each State would have furnished all their Representatives sufficient employment at home, to render it unnecessary for any of them to travel a great distance in search of Quixotic adventures. Did not, then, all the State of Massachusetts, with its District of Maine, furnish one foe, upon whose recreant hide the honorable gentleman could gain the spurs of knighthood, or break his ponderous lance? Sir, the gentleman mistakes entirely the nature of the presentment of which he complains. The grand jury never entertained an idea that he would be arraigned and tried upon their information. They believed, however erroneously, that there was a matter of great public interest, on which they chose to express their opinions. Certainly their right is as undoubted to find fault with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (who, by-the-by, they do not name,) as the Legislature of Massachusetts has to censure the members of any other State, either by the tale or the gross. But the honorable gentleman took occasion to say that he knew nothing of the political character of that State, but from one remarkable and corrupt act which his constituents will always have occasion to recollect. Mr. F. said he could say nothing of the value of that judgment of the policy of a State, which was formed upon the examination of a particular fact in her history. This much, however, he could proudly say, that although her system was defective, and she had committed a multitude of faults, she had virtues to redeem them all. She would not shrink from a comparison with any State in the Union. If the honorable gentleman was disposed to make an examination of the merits of their respective States, Mr. F. would demonstrate that the one was still an angel of light, the other less than an archangel ruined. The constituents of the honorable gentleman have good reason to remember the act to which he alludes. The General Government, by the terms of the Yazoo compromise, have paid them well to recollect it. They have received the value of the property they purchased from the original holders in Georgia, and have not paid the purchase money. If they have any moral sense, they must unwillingly recollect this circumstance, from "certain compunctious visitings," which even successful fraud cannot elude.

Mr. F. said he had no doubt the obnoxious law would be repealed. The anxiety he felt was, that it should be done in such a manner as became the honor and dignity of that body. Whatever was done should be done in the same spirit, and in the same manner, in which the act was originally passed. If a per diem was substituted, and he hoped it would be, it ought to be calculated as commencing with the present session, both as a matter of principle and policy. It was right in itself, that the House should apply the same rule to the settlement of its accounts as were to be applied hereafter. It was due to a sense of decorum, that no person should be able to mistake or misrepresent the motive of the delay which had taken place in acting upon this business. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had supposed it necessary to go still further back, and embrace the receipts and settlement of the last session. This was altogether impracticable, and incorrect in principle. The House had as much right to go back to the 13th, 12th, and 11th Congresses, as to the last session of Congress. The accounts were adjusted, and the money not only vested, but received. It had been said on this floor, very much to his surprise, for although used out of the House, he had not expected to meet with such an opinion here, that restitution of the extra pay of the last session was necessary to reinstate the House in the good opinion of the people; that it was improper or indelicate, in those who voted against the act, to receive the compensation fixed by it. Mr. F. could not understand how it should be necessary to confess the corrupt motive, in order to escape the effect of such an imputation. Certainly, if fraud had been committed, restitution was the best proof of sincere repentance; but until this was admitted, the strong expression of an inclination to restore, was rather suspicious than satisfactory. The people would not expect the House to violate principle, out of an affectation of purity. The charge of indelicacy on those who had received the increased compensation has been made, but it did not deserve a reply; and he should not have noticed it, had it not been occasionally spoken of in the State of Georgia. As he had not replied to it, then, he hoped to be forgiven for replying to it now. Mr. F. said he knew no difference between a law fixing a salary, and other laws. All affected by it were entitled to its benefits, or obliged to bear the burdens it might impose. In whatever station he had been or should be placed, he should consider himself bound to perform all its duties, and to receive all its emoluments and its honors.

He did not pretend to more patriotism, or less selfishness, than fell to the lot of most men; but he had not as yet taken money into the calculation of the inducements to enter or continue in public life. He had motives of a higher character, although certainly personal motives; the desire of honorable employment; the hope of being useful; the anxiety for those distinctions conferred even by unsuccessful exertions to promote the prosperity of a free people; to preserve and to maintain the character of the Government of this country. To the gentlemen who had expressed, or who had entertained any opinions unfavorable to those who had taken part against the act, and yet received its benefits, he would ask was it not ours by the law of the land, constitutionally and honestly passed? Did our opinions of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the amount of the policy or impolicy of the change, affect our rights more than your claims? Are you willing to acknowledge yourselves guilty of corruption, in order to fix upon us the charge of indelicacy? To admit that you have committed a felony, to make us chargeable as accessories after the fact? It is upon these grounds alone the charge is defensible; and unless it is defended with these principles, it is as ridiculous as it is unjust.

Mr. PICKERING said he was opposed to the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) I cannot consent, said Mr. P., to refund the compensation granted by the law of the last session. It was a compensation for services rendered. It was conformable to the Constitution, which declares that the Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation—for what? To defray their expenses, as some have contended? No; but "for their services." And how these should be compensated, was best understood by the eminent men who framed the Constitution, and who, in the several State Conventions, accepted and ratified it. Many of these distinguished citizens were members of the first Congress, in 1789, when the original compensation was fixed, and what they proposed, was approved by WASHINGTON; than whom, no man entertained a more correct sense of personal dignity, nor more justly estimated what was due to character and station; at the same time, no man observed a more exact economy in the expenditure of money, whether his country's or his own. No one can be ignorant of the comparative value of money in 1789 and in 1816; that the prices of the articles necessary for decent living, were, in the latter period, at least double what they were in the former. Take, for example, wheat, the price of which did not then exceed one dollar a bushel. The gentleman from Virginia, before me (Mr. RANDOLPH) beckons, and says it was only three shillings and six pence (fifty-eight cents) a bushel! But, suppose it to have been a dollar; six bushels of wheat, worth six dollars, were then only equal to the daily pay of a member of Congress. The same six bushels of wheat, in 1816, would bring from twelve to fifteen dollars. Hence it follows, that the compensation to members of Congress, in 1789, was double in value to the compensation as it stood prior to the law of March, 1815—nay, more than double; for the six dollars for every twenty miles travel in 1789, was equal to twelve dollars in 1816; and by the law of the last session the allowance for travel remained unchanged—six dollars only for every twenty miles. Imagine that the compensation in 1789, had been set at six bushels of wheat per day, and continued to this time, would any one now think of receiving only three bushels a day, and distribute the other three among his constituents? If some gentlemen are willing to serve for a bare reimbursement of their expenses, receiving the residue in honor, I am too poor to join that class. I must have stayed at home to cultivate my little farm. I must be paid for my "services." If, indeed, the present compensation, so much below what it was in 1789, greatly surpasses the services I am capable of rendering, this should have been looked to by those who sent me here; I did not send myself, nor offer myself as a candidate. I know not by whom my name was proposed, originally for the Senate, latterly for this House. All I know of the matter, is, that formerly I was there and now am here, in consequence of the elections; and the compensation I have received I shall retain, nor, unless it be forced from me, will I let it go.

The question was now taken on Mr. RANDOLPH'S substitute, and negatived by a very large majority.

In the course of the debate on Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion, Mr. REYNOLDS suggested the propriety of so amending the proposition as to make the excess refundable with legal interest; but it was not offered for decision.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to amend the bill, so as to take effect from the commencement of the present session instead of from the passage thereof.

This motion was opposed by Mr. GROSVENOR, and advocated by Mr. FORSYTH at some length, when the motion was negatived—ayes 55, noes 96.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill, as amended, to the House.

FRIDAY, January 17.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Oliver Spellman, from imprisonment," and the bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of John Ricard, from imprisonment," with amendments to the latter, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. PICKENS, from the select committee on the subject, made a report on the petition of certain Delegates of the Mississippi Territory, praying for the admission of that Territory into the Union as an independent State without division. The report embraces a general view of the extent and population of the Territory and its presumed capacity for maintaining additional population, and concluded by the introduction of a bill for the admission of the whole Territory into the Union as one State; which bill was twice read by its title, and committed. The report is as follows:

That they have considered the subject with all that attention which the means in their power have enabled them. The question most immediately involved in the reference was, whether the Mississippi Territory ought to form one entire State, or be divided into two—a question much more important both to the people of the Territory and to the nation than whether its admission should be immediate. The considerations deemed of most weight in determining this question are, 1st. As regards the general interest of the Union; 2d. The wishes of the people of the Territory; and, 3d. The convenience and policy of the particular government of the Territory.

1st. The principal point affecting the national interest will consist in the great relative strength of such an extensive member of the confederacy, if admitted entire. The great extent of its limits, and the space it occupies on the map of the United States, naturally excite inquiry as to the capacity of its soil and other qualities to afford at any period a dense population; and the inquiry should be directed to a remote period, when the Indian titles shall have become extinct and the country matured by improvement. Although your committee deem it impracticable to obtain anything like an accurate estimate of the proportions of land fit and unfit for cultivation in that remote Territory, so great a portion of which is yet a wilderness, yet, from the general information collected from those who have explored its different parts, and from the progress of settlement and sale of public lands within the tract of country to which the Indian title has been long extinguished, your committee cannot apprehend that the whole Territory is capable of such a strong population as ever to render it a formidable State compared with the largest sized of the Northern, Middle, and Western States.

By a statement from the General Land Office, accompanying this report, it appears that the amount of sales of public land in the Mississippi Territory, from the first opening of a land office therein (in 1807) till the 30th September last, exclusive of Madison county, was 833,534.49 acres. The land districts in which these sales were effected extend from the Mississippi river, eastward, more than two hundred and twenty miles, to the dividing ridge between the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers, and a little over sixty miles from the thirty-first degree of latitude northward, and contain more than eight millions of acres. It appears, from the concurrent testimony of persons acquainted with the Territory in question, that an uncommon proportion of its land is unfit for cultivation; much thereof consisting of poor pine barrens; while, on the other hand, it is certain that there is much fertile soil on the margin of the rivers, and interspersed over different parts, capable to sustain a sufficient population for a respectable State. Its political strength will also be held in check by the great proportion of slaves it is destined to contain. This circumstance, added to the climate and soil, will render its numbers (entitled to political calculation) relatively small compared with its extent.

2. As to the wishes of the people themselves, various representations have been made showing a difference of sentiment to exist among them in regard to a division. It is, however, worthy of notice that for several successive years the Legislature of the Territory have petitioned Congress for admission as a State; in none of which have they intimated a wish to be divided.

3. As to the policy and convenience of the particular Government. The form of the Territory is nearly square, and its average length and width nearly equal. By any line of division, the distant extremes will be but little more convenient to a point at the centre of either division than to the centre of the whole Territory. As to the different parts having different avenues to market—the western by the navigation of the Mississippi river and the waters of Lake Pontchartrain, the eastern by the waters of Mobile and Chatahoochee—it is not seen that this will create any material diversity of interest, or interfere with the internal policy and harmony of the State, all parts of which will be agricultural, and capable of similar products. Nor is it known that local animosities are more peculiar to large than to small States. These are not unusual even in the bounds of a county. It is, indeed, more probable that a large State would incline to cherish its institutions by a liberal policy.

The geographical position of this Territory may render it necessary that its military defences should be more combined than would at all times be practicable in two distinct sovereignties.

It may be proper to take notice of the situation of each division in case the parts are separated by a line such as has been in contemplation, and as proposed by a bill now before this House; although your committee presume, if any division is to be made, the line proposed may be as judicious as any other. The western division will contain 25,037 free white inhabitants, and 22,834 slaves, by the census taken lately. By the census taken in 1810, there were west of the line of division 16,602 white inhabitants, and 14,523 slaves, including in the last census the county of Jackson, formerly a part of Florida, making an increase of 8,435 white, and 8,311 slave inhabitants, in the last period of six years, including a new county from Florida. In the whole western division there is no land to which the Indian title is extinguished but what has been some time in market, and most of it embracing the oldest settlements in the Territory. What prospect may exist of extending the scope for settlement by purchases from the Indians is not known to your committee; until which time the increase of population in that quarter must be gradual.

While your committee believe it expedient to admit the whole Territory to the rights of State government, and that immediately, they consider it just to the population which will in a few years occupy the extensive space on the east side of the Tombigbee, which has lately been acquired from the several Indian tribes, to afford the citizens of the State now to be formed a fair opportunity of revising their constitution after a reasonable time, and recommend a provision for that purpose.

Your committee ask leave to report a bill for admitting the Mississippi Territory into the Union as a State.

CLAIM OF RENNER & HEATH.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Renner and Heath; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

That, in the year 1814, the petitioners owned a ropewalk in the City of Washington, in which was contained a large quantity of spun yarns and Navy cordage, all of which was destroyed by burning by the British forces at the time they invaded the City of Washington, on the 24th of August in that year. On or about the 20th of July, 1814, one of the petitioners, Mr. Heath, applied to Mr. Southerlin, the owner of some large boats then lying in the Potomac, and engaged five of them to transport his cordage and yarns up the river, if the enemy should invade the City. On the 18th or 19th of August, it was deemed expedient by General Winder to impress the boats of Mr. Southerlin, for the purpose of transporting troops across the Potomac, and they were kept in the employment of the Government until after the 24th of August. On the 20th of August the petitioners applied for the boats, according to contract, for the purpose of removing their property, when they were informed that the boats were impressed. It also appears to the committee that, on the 22d of August, the petitioners employed a wagon and nine or ten carts for the purpose of removing the property in the ropewalk, but the wagon and two or three of the carts were impressed by the officers of the departments, to remove the public papers and property; and that seven of the carts employed, after taking loads from the ropewalk out of the City to the place directed, refused to return to haul any more for the petitioners, apprehending, as is stated in the petition, that if they did they would be impressed into the employment of the Government.

It is also stated and believed that, after that day, and before the enemy entered the City, carriages were not to be had to remove the property. The loss of the petitioners, exclusive of the price of the ropewalk, amounts, according to the estimate of the petitioners, to about $24,800, and they pray that Congress would reimburse them the amount of their loss.

The committee are of opinion that the Government is under no obligation to indemnify the claimants. The ropewalk, and the yarns and cordage deposited in it, were all the property of private citizens, and, according to the usages of modern warfare, entitled to protection. It is true that the cordage manufactured in the walk might have been purchased and used in the naval service of the United States, but, if so used, it was first the subject of contract between the owner and Government. The mere circumstance that the cordage made in the walk might, under a contract with the owner, be applied to public purposes, does not impart to the property the character of public property, and thereby exclude it from that respect and safety which, in the progress of civilized warfare, has been extended to private property. Upon this ground, therefore, it is considered that, according to uniform decisions made by the House of Representatives, the petitioners are not entitled to relief.

Admitting, however, that the property was of that public character which would have authorized its destruction by the enemy, it does not appear, in this case, that the petitioners were prevented from saving such of their property as they could have removed by the impressments made by the officers of the Government. It appears that, on the 22d of August, of the ten carts employed by the complainants seven were not impressed, but took, each of them, one load from the walks, and afterwards, of their own accord, left the service of the petitioners. Had that number of carts continued to haul the cordage and yarn till the enemy came into the City on the evening of the 24th, there can be no doubt it would have been removed.

The committee are of opinion the petitioners are not entitled to relief, and therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought to be granted.

CLASSIFICATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. HARRISON, from the committee on the subject of classing and reorganizing the militia, made a report thereon, embracing a wide and general view of the matter committed to them. With the report, Mr. H. introduced a bill for organizing, classing, and arming the militia, which was twice read by its title, and, with the report, ordered to be printed. The report is as follows:

The committee of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the reorganization and classification of the militia, and the report of the acting Secretary of War, of the 16th ultimo, report herewith a bill for that purpose:

The organization of regiments, brigades, and divisions, has been adopted by the committee in opposition to very high authority, because it is the one which has heretofore been used in all the States, and because it appeared better suited to the tactics of the present day, than the new complex system of the legion, recommended by General Knox, in his report of 1790.

The mode of classification contained in the bill has been frequently recommended in the reports of committees of the House, and in those of the Department of War. The effects of this plan will be felt only when the militia are called into the service of the United States, and will not affect the constitution of the corps, as it now exists, for the ordinary duties of muster and discipline; the advantages of a system that will bring into the same corps, for the duties of the field, men of the same age and vigor, and throw the burden of military duty upon that class of citizens who would be enabled to perform it with fewer personal sacrifices, were the motives to its adoption.

The junior or middle class will be composed of men who have small families, or those who have none; who are in the full enjoyment of bodily strength and activity, and whose minds will be more easily excited to military ardor and the love of glory, than those of a more advanced period of life.

In the performance of the duty assigned them, the committee progressed thus far without difficulty; but they considered their task as barely commenced. An organization, however perfect, is but a single step towards the desirable object; the great difficulty to be encountered is the application of a system of discipline, or military instruction, to a great population, scattered over an immense territory.

The accomplishment of this object at once, is evidently not within the power of the Government. To instruct the present militia of the country to any useful extent, would require a larger portion of their time than they can possibly spare from the duty of providing for their families, unless they are liberally paid. To pay them, would absorb all the resources of the nation. The alternative appears to be, to direct the efforts of the Government to instruct such a portion of the militia as their means will allow, and which would produce the most beneficial result upon the whole mass; leaving to the effects of another system the gradual introduction of those military acquirements which, in a Republican Government, it is so essential for every citizen to possess. Acting upon this principle, and believing that the instruction which it is in the power of the Government to give, would be more usefully bestowed upon the whole of the officers and sergeants of the militia, than upon any particular class, the sections of the bill, which relate to this part of the subject, have been adopted by the committee. They have also considered it to be proper to annex some estimates of the annual expense of the system they recommend.

Although it may be considered, that by presenting a bill for the "organization and classification" of the militia, and the exposition of their motives which accompany it, the committee have performed the task assigned them by the resolution under which they acted; they have, nevertheless, believed it to be their duty to submit some further views, the result of their deliberations upon this important subject.

This course may be more excusable, as the committee have no hesitation in acknowledging that the plan embraced by the bill is a mere expedient; a choice of difficulties; a system, which although it will place the militia upon a much better footing than they have before stood on, yet is not likely to produce that great desideratum—that indispensable requisite in a Government constituted like ours—the diffusion of a military spirit and military information throughout the great mass of the people.

The part of the subject which still remains to be discussed, will be best understood by dividing it into two distinct propositions.

1st. Is it desirable that the whole male population of the United States, of the proper age, should be trained to the use of arms, so as to supersede, under any circumstances, the necessity of a standing army?

2d. Is it practicable?

The solicitude which has been manifested by the great men who have successively filled the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States, for the adoption of a system of military discipline for the militia, which would produce the effect contemplated by the first proposition, sufficiently manifests their sense of its importance. The subject was often and warmly recommended by the Father of his Country, and, at an early period of his Administration, a plan for the purpose was proposed by the Secretary of War, and, being corrected agreeably to his suggestions, was submitted to the National Legislature. It is believed that objections to the expense and supposed difficulty of executing this plan, and not to its object, was the cause of its being rejected. Is the opinion, which prevailed at that period, that an energetic national militia was to be regarded as the capital security of a free Republic, less apparent at the present? Has anything since occurred, either in the history of our own or of any other country, to show that a standing "army, forming a distinct class in the community," is the proper defence of a Government constructed like ours? Do the events of the late war show that discipline is not necessary for the militia? Or does the present aspect of the political world afford so much security as to justify the indifference which prevails in providing an effectual national defence.

JANUARY, 1817.

Classification of the Militia.

H. OF R.

It is impossible that any American can recur to many of the events, and particularly to the concluding scenes of the late war, without feeling that elevation of mind which a recollection of his country's glory is calculated to produce.

There are, however, others, and not a few, that are eminently calculated to show that an immense sacrifice of blood and treasure can be distinctly traced to the want of discipline in the militia. The glorious success which, in several instances, crowned their efforts, was the result of uncommon valor, or of valor united with the advantage of a position suited to their peculiar character. The greater part of the American militia, accustomed from their early youth to the use of fire-arms, are doubtless more formidable than any other troops in the world, in the defence of a line or rampart. Victories in the field are gained by other qualities—by those disciplined evolutions which give harmony and concert to numerous bodies of men, and enable whole armies to move with the activity and address of single combatants. Let our militia be instructed, and America would be equal to a contest with the rest of the world united. The improvements which have been made in the art of war since the commencement of the French Revolution, give greater advantages to invading and disciplined armies, acting against those of a contrary character, than they before possessed. This arises from their increased activity, produced by the great multiplication of their light troops; the celerity of movement given to the artillery; and, above all, to the improvements in the staff, placing the subsistence of large armies upon a footing of security, beyond what was formerly supposed to be possible. An improvement in tactics, which gives advantages to the professed soldier who fights for conquest, over the citizen who bears arms only in defence of his country, is perhaps to be regretted, and no alternative is left to the latter, but to perfect himself in the same arts and discipline. It is believed that there is no instance on record of a Republic, whose citizens had been trained to the use of arms, having been conquered by a nation possessing a different form of Government. Small Republics have been overthrown by those which were more powerful, as Saguntum destroyed by Carthage, and Numantia by Rome; but it has been observed of those Governments that "walls and towers became their funeral piles—leaving nothing to their conquerors but their ashes."

The committee cannot conceive that any aspect, however pacific it may be, which the Governments of Europe may, for the present, have assumed towards this country, should be used as an argument to procrastinate, even for a day, any measure calculated to render their future hostility abortive. It cannot be believed that any real friendship can exist in the breasts of the sovereigns of that continent, for a Government which has been founded upon principles so opposite to theirs, and which, by the happiness it diffuses, affords an eternal satire and reproach upon their conduct. Whatever security there may be derived from their policy, none can certainly be expected from their forbearance, whenever, from a change of circumstances, they may think it proper to change their policy. The liberties of America must, then, be preserved as they were won—by the arms, the discipline, and the valor of her free-born sons.

But the defence of our country against a foreign enemy, does not constitute the only (perhaps not the chief) motive of military improvements, to the extent contemplated by the proposition we are considering. The safety of a Republic depends as much upon the equality in the use of arms among its citizens, as upon the equality of rights; nothing can be more dangerous in such a Government, than to have a knowledge of the military art confined to a part of the people—for sooner or later that part will govern.

The effects of discipline, possessed by a few, to control numbers without, is to be seen in all the despotic Governments of modern, as well as ancient times.

In general, however, the subjects of those despotic Governments, which preserve their authority by standing armies, are not allowed the use of arms; but the use of arms is not alone sufficient. A striking example of this is to be found in one of the Grecian Republics: The Spartans were enabled, by the force of discipline alone, to keep in subjection for ages the Helots, and other ancient inhabitants of Laconia. These men were not only allowed the use of arms, but, upon almost every occasion, formed the greater part of the Lacedemonian army; nor were they deficient in bravery; but they were not permitted to learn that admirable discipline which distinguished the Oplites, or heavy armed infantry of Sparta.

Another important consideration, urging the diffusion of a military spirit among our citizens, is the counterpoise it will afford to that inordinate desire of wealth which seems to have pervaded the whole nation, bringing with it habits of luxury, manners and principles highly unfavorable to our Republican institutions.

The first effect of this state of society, is the substitution of a standing army for a national militia. Upon this subject, the committee beg leave to make a quotation from the report of General Knox, corrected by President Washington. "It is," says the patriotic Secretary, "the introduction of vice and corruption of manners into the mass of the people, that renders a standing army necessary. It is when public spirit is despised, and avarice, indolence, and effeminacy of manners, predominate, and prevent the establishment of institutions which would elevate the minds of the youth in the paths of virtue and honor, that a standing army is formed and rivetted forever." So true is the principle here contended for, that it is believed there is no instance in history, of a nation losing its liberties where the military spirit of the people did not decline in the same proportion that the corruption of manners advanced. Nor was any free Government ever overturned by an internal convulsion, until the destruction of that spirit had been first produced in the body of the people. It was not until the amusements of the theatre, the baths, and the public gardens, had superseded the exercises of the Campus Martius, that a Roman army dared to revolt against its country, and with the power of the sword to substitute for its free institutions the arbitrary will of a dictator. Eighty years before the successful usurpation of Cæsar, the revolt of an army could have produced no such consequence.

But the habits of the people had been changed; no longer in every Roman citizen was to be found a trained and practised soldier; the higher tactics were cultivated, indeed, with zeal and success by a martial nobility. No period had been more prolific of great generals. At none had the discipline of the legions been so perfect; but they were no longer filled by citizens taking their routine of service. The military had become a distinct profession; composed of men who, in the habits of war and pillage, had forgotten the sacred obligations attached to their character as citizens, and who were ever as ready, upon the suggestion of their leader, to turn their arms against their country, as the enemy whom they were raised to oppose.

As, in every age, then, and in every country, the same cause will produce the same effects, the palladium of American liberty must be the diffusion of military discipline and military spirit through the whole body of the people.

But, secondly—Is the object attainable?

That it is not attainable by any of the systems which have heretofore been in use in the United States, is very evident, from the little success which has attended them. The late war repeatedly exhibited the melancholy fact of large corps of militia going to the field of battle without understanding a single elementary principle, and without being able to perform a single evolution. Yet militia laws must exist, and have existed, in all the States since the war of the Revolution, which set apart with great precision a number of days in each year, for the purposes of training and discipline. But, from this plan, no good fruit has ever been produced. It was an error, indeed, common to all the militia systems in use in the United States, that the periods for training were too short and too distant from each other to produce much benefit.

To remedy this defect, camps of discipline have been recommended. One of the reasons which governed the committee in rejecting that part of the Secretary of War's recommendation has been explained above; but if that objection could be overcome, the committee are far from thinking that the object could at all be accomplished in that way. There is another more formidable obstacle to success; more formidable, because it arises from the nature of our Government, and the constitution of the human character. The sentiments and habits of a free country necessarily produce amongst the citizens a superior restlessness under restraint, than is to be met with in the subjects of a monarchy. This spirit frequently manifests itself even in a career of military services where the high interests involved, (and in which they largely partake,) and the evident necessity of discipline, might be supposed able to correct it. There can scarcely be a restraint more vexatious and disgusting to a grown man, than the initiatory lessons of the military art. Military discipline consists in the observance of a number of minute particulars, which, to the novice in arms, have no apparent object; but which form the links of a beautiful and connected system. It is believed that, to this cause, is to be attributed the little progress which has been made in training the militia of the United States; nor is there much prospect that any change of system could, with regard to the present militia, produce the result at which we aim.

In searching for landmarks to guide us to our object, it will be in vain that we direct our attention to the modern nations of Europe; from them we can borrow nothing to aid our purpose—Governments formed upon artificial distinctions in society—which estimate their security by the inability of their subjects to resist oppression, can furnish a free people with no guides in organizing a system of defence which shall be purely national. We are, however, not without resource.

The ancient Republics, from which we have drawn many of the choicest maxims upon which to found our civil institutions, will furnish also a most perfect model for our system of national defence. The whole secret of ancient military glory—the foundation of that wonderful combination of military skill and exalted valor which enabled the petty Republic of Athens to resist the mighty torrent of Persian invasion; which formed the walls of Sparta, and conducted the Roman legions—influenced, indeed, by unhallowed motives—to the conquest of the world, will be found in the military education of the youth. The victories of Marathon and Plataea, of Cynocéphale and Pydna, were the practical results of the exercises of the Campus Martius and Gymnasia. It is on a foundation of this kind, and of this kind only, that an energetic national militia can be established.

"An examination into the employments and obligations of individuals comprising the society," says General Knox, "will evince the impossibility of diffusing an adequate knowledge of the art of war by any other means than a course of discipline during the period of non-age; the time necessary to acquire this important knowledge, cannot be afforded at any other period of life with so little injury to the public or private interests." Nothing is more true than what is here advanced, and it is most singular that the amiable and patriotic Secretary should have founded his plan upon a course of instruction to commence within the limits of non-age, indeed, but at so advanced a period of it, that all the objections which could be made to the disciplining at a more advanced age will apply equally to it, with the addition of others which are more cogent, and which are supposed to be inherent in the system itself. Of his advanced corps, composed of the youth of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty, years of age; those of eighteen and nineteen are to be drawn out for thirty days in each year; and those of twenty, for ten days, to be instructed in camps of discipline.

It has been strongly urged against this plan, that the separation of the youth at that critical age, from the superintending vigilance of their parents and guardians, would be a very dangerous step, and that the loss of time from the pursuit of their professions and occupations would prove to them a most serious evil.

Whatever force there may be in these objections, the committee are fully persuaded that the improvement to be derived from the execution of this plan would not compensate for the expense and loss of time it would occasion. The perfection of discipline as it regards the soldier is the grace, the precision and address, with which he performs certain evolutions. To arrive at this perfection, long-continued practice is essential.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

And, since it must be evident that the time necessary for this purpose cannot be taken from the avocations of our citizens, after they have arrived at the age of manhood, the only alternative is to devise a system of military instruction, which will be engrafted on and form a part of the ordinary education of our youth.

The organization of a system, thus extensive in its operations, must necessarily be a work of some time and difficulty. The want of statistical information will prevent the committee from submitting to the House, at this time, more than the outline of their plan. It is embraced in the following propositions:

As the important advantages of the military part of the education of youth will accrue to the community, and not to the individuals who acquire it, it is proper that the whole expense of the Establishment should be borne by the public Treasury.

That, to comport with the equality which is the basis of our Constitution, the organization of the Establishment should be such as to extend, without exception, to every individual of the proper age.

That, to secure this, the contemplated military instruction should not be given in distinct schools, established for that purpose, but that it should form a branch of education in every school within the United States.

That a corps of the military instructors should be formed to attend to the gymnastic and elementary part of education in every school in the United States, whilst the more scientific part of the art of war shall be communicated by professors of tactics, to be established in all the higher seminaries.

The committee are fully aware that the establishment of an institution, which from its nature is calculated to produce an important change in the manners and habits of the nation, will be received with caution and distrust by a people jealous of their liberties, and who boast of a Government which executes its powers with the least possible sacrifice of individual rights. An encroachment upon individual rights forms no part of their system. It is not a conscription which withdraws from an anxious parent a son for whose morals he fears more than for his life. It is not a Persian or Turkish mandate to educate the youth within the purlieus of a corrupt Court, but a system as purely republican in practice as in principle.

The means are furnished by the Government, and the American youth are called upon to qualify themselves, under the immediate inspection of their parents, or of tutors chosen by their parents, for the sacred task of defending the liberties of their country.

Although the system of General Knox widely differs from that which has been recommended by the committee, his opinion of the effects to be produced by it is conceived to be more particularly applicable to the latter. "If the United States," says he, "possess the vigor of mind to establish the first institution, for the military instruction of the youth, it may reasonably be expected to produce the most unequivocal advantages. A glorious national spirit will be introduced with its extensive train of political consequences. The youth will imbibe a love of their country, reverence and obedience to its laws, courage and elevation of mind, openness and liberality of character, accompanied by a just spirit of honor. In addition to which, their bodies will acquire a robustness greatly conducive to their personal happiness; while habit, with its silent, but efficacious operations, will durably cement the system."

That the House may possess the information necessary to act upon this important subject, the committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to prepare and lay before this House, at the next session of Congress, a plan for the military instruction of all the youth of the United States, in the way which is best calculated for the purpose, with as little injury as possible to the ordinary course of education.

THE COMPENSATION LAW.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported from the Committee of the whole House, to the bill allowing compensation to the members of Congress and delegates from Territories and to repeal all other acts contrary thereto; and the said amendments being again read as follows, to wit:

"Fill the several blanks in the bill with the word 'six.' So as to allow a compensation of 'six' dollars per day to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate; a like sum of 'six' dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, and returning to his said residence, as also six dollars per day each, to the President pro tempore of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in addition to their pay as members of their respective Houses."

And, on the question, "Will the House concur with the Committee of the whole House in their said amendments?" being stated,

Mr. CALHOUN said, that he hoped the House would not agree to fill the blanks with six dollars, as reported by the Committee of the Whole. He had remained silent thus long, not that he agreed with those who thought this a trivial question, but because he was anxious, in ultimately making up his mind, to profit by the observations of others. He had, however, finally adopted the course which he intended to pursue. If the blank was filled with a sum fully equal to the present pay, he would vote for the bill on its passage, not that in itself he preferred the daily to the annual pay; for on that point his opinion remained unaltered. He believed the latter for several reasons, which would not be repeated, to be of itself preferable. The daily, however, had one advantage at present over the other mode; it had a greater prospect of being permanent. If the pay, said he, is left in its present form, it will most certainly be repealed by the next Congress, whatever may be the feelings of a majority of that body, as to the mode or the amount of pay. They will not be free agents; most of them being already committed in the canvass for a seat in this House. But should the mode be changed, and the amount retained, the very men who have turned out the most of us, who have been the agitators in the late elections, will in all probability become the pacificators. For we may be perfectly assured of the fact, that the feelings of those gentlemen are very different now and before the elections. If you change the mode, they will seize the opportunity, and assert that you have now done what ought originally to have been done. Should the blank not be filled with an adequate sum, say nine or ten dollars a day, he would vote against the passage of the bill, so as to retain the present law; but if it must come to a repeal, he would prefer it to take place after the 4th of March, so as to leave the subject entirely open for the next Congress. Such was the course that he would pursue.

It had more than once been said that this is not an important subject. If the observation was made in reference to the members who now composed this body, he would readily assent. To them it is a trivial subject. They are free agents, and if they find the sacrifice too considerable, they can at any moment return to those private pursuits, so much more profitable, and, in many respects, desirable. We, then, as individuals, have no right to complain, should the pay be reduced to the smallest amount. But there is another aspect of this subject of a very different character. The question of adequate or inadequate pay to the members of Congress is, if he was not greatly mistaken, intimately connected with the very essence of our liberty. This House is the foundation of the fabric of our liberty. So happy is its constitution, that in all instances of a general nature, its duty and its interests are inseparable. If he understood correctly the structure of our Government, the prevailing principle is not so much a balance of power, as a well-connected chain of responsibility. That responsibility commenced here, and this House is the centre of its operation. The members are elected for two years only; and at the end of that period are responsible to their constituents for the faithful discharge of their public duties. Besides, the very structure of the House is admirably calculated to unite interest and duty. The members of Congress have in their individual capacity no power or prerogative. These attach to the entire body assembled here, and acting under certain forms. We then as individuals are, said Mr. C., not less amenable to the laws which we enact, than the humblest citizen. Such is the responsibility, such the structure, such the sure foundation of our liberty. If we turn our attention to what are called the co-ordinate branches of our Government, we find them very differently constructed. The Judiciary is in no degree responsible to the people immediately. To Congress, to this body, is the whole of their responsibility. Such, too, in a great measure, is the theory of our Government, as applied to the Executive branch. It is true the President is elected for a term of years, but that term is twice the length of ours; and, besides, his election is in point of fact, removed in all of the States three degrees from the people; the Electors in many of the States are chosen by the State Legislatures, and where that is not formally the case, yet it is in point of fact effected through the agency of those bodies. But what mainly distinguishes the Legislative and Executive branches, as it regards their actual responsibility to the people, is the nature of their operation. It is the duty of the former to enact laws, of the latter to execute them. Every citizen of ordinary information is capable, in a greater or less degree, to form an opinion of the propriety of the law; and consequently whether Congress has or has not done its duty; but of the execution of the laws, they are far less competent to judge. How can the community judge whether the President, in appointing officers to execute the laws, has in all cases been governed by fair and honest motives, or by favor or corruption? How much less competent is it to judge whether the application of the public money has been made with economy and fidelity, or with waste and corruption! These are facts that can be fully investigated, and brought before the public by Congress, and Congress only. Hence it is that the Constitution has made the President responsible to Congress. This, then, is the essence of our liberty; Congress is responsible to the people immediately, and the other branches of Government are responsible to it. What then becomes of the theory of the Government, if the President holds offices in his gift, which, as it regards honor or profit, are more desirable than a seat in this House, the only office immediately in the gift of the people? Here Mr. C. checked himself. He found himself, he said, committing an unpardonable error, in presenting arguments to this body. The car of this House on this subject, said he, is sealed against truth and reason. What has produced this magic spell? Instructions! Well, then, has it come to this? Have the people of this country snatched the power of deliberation from this body? Have they resolved the Government into its original elements, and resumed to themselves their primitive power of legislation? Are we then a body of individual agents, and not a deliberate one without the power, but possessing the form of legislation? If such be the fact, let gentlemen produce their instructions, properly authenticated. Let them name the time and place at which the people assembled, and deliberated on this question. O no! they have no written, no verbal instructions; but they have implied instructions. The law is unpopular, and they are bound to repeal it, in opposition to their conscience and reason. Have gentlemen reflected on the consequences of this doctrine? Are we bound in all cases to do what is popular? If it is true, how are political errors, once prevalent, ever to be corrected? Suppose a party to spring up in this country, whose real views were the destruction of liberty; suppose that by management, by the patronage of offices, by the corruption of the press, they should delude the people, and obtain a majority—and surely such a state of things is not impossible—what then will be the effect of this doctrine? Ought we to sit quiet? Ought we to be dumb? or rather ought we to approve, though we see that liberty is to be engulfed? This doctrine of implied instructions, if I am not mistaken, is a new one, for the first time broached in this House; and, if I am not greatly deceived, not more new than dangerous. It is very different in its character and effects, from the old doctrine that the constituents have a right to assemble and formally to instruct the Representative; and though I would not hold myself bound to obey any such instructions, yet I conceive that the doctrine is not of a very dangerous character, as the good sense of the people has as yet prevented them from exercising such a right, and will, in all probability, in future prevent them. But this novel doctrine is of a far different character. Such instructions may exist any day and on any subject. It may be always at hand to justify any aberration from political duty. Mr. C. would ask its advocates in what do they differ in their actions from the mere trimmer, the political weathercock? It is true, the one may have in view his own advancement, in consulting his popularity; and the other may be governed by a mistaken but conscientious regard to duty; yet, how is the country benefitted by this difference, since they equally abandon the plain road of truth and reason, to worship at the shrine of this political idol. It was said by a member from Massachusetts (Mr. CONNER) that this right of instruction is only denied in monarchies, and, as a proof of it, he cited the opinion of Mr. Burke, whom he called a pensioner, at the Bristol election. So far is he from being correct, that in none of the free Governments of antiquity can he point out the least trace of his doctrine. It originated in the modern Governments of Europe, particularly that of Great Britain. The English Parliament had, at its origin, no other power or duty, but granting money to the Crown; and as the members of that body were frequently urgently pressed to enlarge their money grants, it was a pretty convenient excuse to avoid the squeeze, to say they were not instructed. The gentleman was incorrect in calling Burke a pensioner at the time he delivered the celebrated speech at the Bristol polls. Burke at that time, whatever may have been his subsequent character, was a first rate champion in the cause of liberty, and of this country; and if the gentleman would recur to the points in which he refused to obey the instructions of his constituents, it will not greatly increase his affection for such doctrines. That mind must be greatly different from mine, said Mr. C., who can read that speech, and not embrace its doctrines.

I too, said Mr. C., am an advocate for instruction. I am instructed. The Constitution is my letter of instruction. Written by the hand of the people, stamped with their authority, it admits of no doubt as to its obligation. Your very acts in opposition to its authority, are null. This is the solemn voice of the people, to which I bow in perfect submission. It is here the vox populi is the vox Dei. This is the all-powerful creative voice which spoke our Government into existence, and made us politically as we are. This body is the first orb in the political creation, and stands next in authority to the original creative voice of the people; and any attempt to give a different direction to its movements, from what the Constitution and the deliberate consideration of its members, point out, I consider as an innovation on the principles of our Government.

14th CON. 2d Sess.—19

This is necessary to make the people really happy; and any one invested with public authority, ought to be as sensibly alive to the people's happiness, as some gentlemen wish the House to be to mere popularity. He knew that such was the structure of our Government, that the permanent feeling of the community would impress itself on this House. He rejoiced that such was the fact, as there would be no security for liberty were it otherwise. The sense of the people, said he, operating fairly and constitutionally through elections, will be felt on this very subject, at the very next session; but surely the question by whom the repeal is to be effected, is one of no slight importance. It can by our successors, if they think proper, be at least consistently done; by us it cannot. Should we reduce it to the old rates, when it is well known that the sense of a great majority of this House is wholly averse to it, besides the great loss of individual character which we must sustain, it is calculated to bring into suspicion all political characters, to the great injury of the public. You may rely on it, the public wish and expect us to act by the convictions of our mind and will, not to tolerate the idea that either on this or any other important occasion you are acting a part, and that you studiously shape your conduct to catch the applause of the audience. Mr. C. said he hoped he would not be misunderstood; that while he combated the idea that we are bound to do such acts as will render us popular, for such he understood the doctrine, we are to overlook the character of those for whom we were to make laws. This was most studiously to be regarded. The laws ought, in all cases, to fit the permanent and settled character of the community. The state of public feeling, then, is a fact to be reckoned upon, and to receive the weight on any particular question to which it may fairly be entitled. But, for his part, he preferred that erectness of mind which, in all cases, felt disposed to embrace what was, in itself, just and wise. Such characters he thought more useful, under our form of Government, than any other, and were more certain of the applause of after ages. If he was not mistaken, it constituted the very essence of the admired characters of antiquity, such as Cato, Phocian, and Aristides; and if we could conceive them divested of this trait, they would cease to be the objects of our admiration.

Mr. C. said, taking it for granted that he had succeeded in proving that this House was at liberty to decide on this question, according to the dictates of its best judgment, he now would resume the argument where he had dropped it. He had proved that this House is the foundation of our liberty; that it is responsible to the people for the faithful discharge of its duties, and that any other branch of Government is responsible to it as the immediate Representatives of the people; and that it is essential to the fair operation of the principles of our constitutions, that this body should not be in any degree under the influence of the other branches of the Government. How then stood the fact? He begged that no one would attribute to him factious views. He would speak in relation to no particular measures or men. He wished simply to execute general principles; to speak to the constituents and the laws. How, then, he repeated, is the fact? Are there not in the power of the President a multitude of offices more profitable, and many both more profitable and honorable in public estimation than a seat in this House—the only office in the General Government in the gift of the people? Have we not seen, in many instances, men attracted out of this House to fill subordinate Executive offices, whose only temptation was pay; and what is far more dangerous, in every respect much more to be dreaded, do we not see the very best talents of the House, men of the most aspiring characters, anxious to fill the departments on foreign missions? Let me not be understood to throw blame on them—the fault is not so much in them as the system. Congress, then, is only the first step in the flight of honorable distinction. So high the people can raise the aspirant, to go beyond, to rise to the highest, the Executive must take him by the hand. On what side then must his inclination be? On the side of his constituents, who can do no more than to keep him where he is, or that of the Executive power, on whom his future hope must depend? Setting corruption aside, which he believed had made no inroad on us, but take human nature as it is, can you expect, with ordinary virtue, that vigilant and bold oversight over the Executive power which the Constitution supposes, and which is necessary to coerce a power possessed of so much patronage? He was aware the evil was difficult to be cured. It was the opinion of some, that no member of either House ought to be capable of being appointed to any office for the term for which the President is elected. It is worthy of reflection. For his part, but one objection occurred to him which he could not surmount. He feared, that so long as the Executive offices which he had mentioned, continued to be more desirable than a seat in the House, it would tend still further to depress the Legislature. The best materials for politics would systematically avoid Congress, and approach Executive favor through some other avenue. Whether this or some other plan be adopted in part, he was confident it was necessary to make a seat in Congress more desirable than what it is even at the present pay. What sum was sufficient for that purpose he stated last year in debate, and had only to regret that the country did not see the same necessity with him on this point. Gentlemen say we ought to come here for pure patriotism and honor. It sounds well; but, if the system be adopted to its full extent, there will be found neither patriotism nor honor sufficient for continual privations. We must regard human nature as it is, said Mr. C., and particularly that portion for whom we legislate. Our countrymen, with many admirable qualities, are, in my opinion, greatly distinguished by the love of acquisition, I will not call it avarice, and the love of honorable distinction. He objected to neither of these traits. They both grew necessarily out of the character of our country and institutions. Our population advances beyond that of all countries; marriages in all conditions of life take place at an early period. Hence, the duty imposed on almost every one to make provision for a growing family. Hence, our love of gain, which, in most instances, is founded on the purest virtues. The love of distinction is not less deeply fixed. In a country of such blended qualities, reliance ought not to be had wholly on honor or profit. They ought to be blended in due proportion. The truth is, that no office requiring long continued privations, will be honored, unless duly rewarded, for it ceases to be an object of pursuit. If these views be correct, the effect of an adequate reward is not only to attract talent to the place where it is most needed, the Legislature, but you make it more stationary there, and what is more essential, place it more beyond Executive control; and thus realize the full effects of the theory of your Government. The additional expense would not be felt; and he knew of no other objection, which had the least plausibility, except that we cannot plead the example of any other country, and that it is calculated to produce too much competition for a seat in Congress. He acknowledged the want of example in other countries, and he thought it worth serious investigation, what effect it had had on the permanency of their liberties. But why should we look for examples either to the State Legislatures or to other countries? In what other instance has the duties of legislation involved so great a sacrifice of time and domestic pursuits? Compare our services here, with that of a judge, or most Executive officers, and they will be found not less burdensome. Nor did he fear that the competition for a seat in Congress would be too animated. He believed a sharply contested election, if corruption did not enter, was of public advantage. It brings the proceedings of this body more fully before the people, and makes them much better acquainted with their interest. It even makes a seat here more honorable in public estimation. Nor was he afraid that competitions would produce corruption. Fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars a year would not be sufficient for this purpose. An election to Congress was, in this respect, more safe than that to a State Legislature; as it requires so many more to elect to the former than the latter. This security grows with the increasing growth of the country; as the number of constituents will, relatively to the representatives, increase. There were other and important considerations, connected with a just pay to the members of this body; but as they had been fairly presented by the report of the committee, he would not fully discuss them. By an inadequate pay, you close the door of public honor on some of the most deserving citizens. Talents in this country are principally from the middling and lower classes. These, in fact, constitute the great body of the community. A young man of talents spends his property and time to acquire sufficient information to pursue a profession. He proves worthy of public confidence; ought he not to receive indemnity for the application of his time and talents to the service of his country? It would be economy with a vengeance to exclude all such from the floor of legislation, or to make them mere political adventurers, who would enter here only for further promotion. The extent of our country, said he, points another and powerful reason why the pay should be respectable. No one is fit for legislation, who does not constantly bear in mind that our Republic is distinguished from all other free countries that has ever existed, by the extent of our territory. While we derive from this distinction many advantages, we are liable to great and menacing dangers. While we behold our growth with pride, it must at the same time impress us with awe. It is our duty to overcome space by every effort in our power. We ought to attract suitable talents from the most distant part of our Republic by a full and generous allowance. Distance itself constitutes a great objection to many to perform the duties of this body. Should the men who by nature and study are endowed with requisite qualities for public service, be forced by a miserable parsimony either to direct their talents to private pursuits, or to affairs of the respective States, and men of inferior capacity be sent to this body, who can measure the public misfortune? What could tend more powerfully to disserve this Union? Some have taken up the idea, as extraordinary as it may seem, that the increased pay to the members is in its nature aristocratical. What! is it aristocratical to compensate the public servant for his services to the public? Can it be considered as favoring the power of a few, to extend the power and influence of the people in the affairs of the General Government? It enables them to select the best talents for their own immediate service. It raises them in the scale of influence, by causing the most shining and aspiring talents to be dependent on them for promotion and honor. It makes their service more desirable than that of Executive employment; and by a simple process enables them through their immediate agents, this House, to hold a controlling power over any department of the Government. Such is the aristocratical tendency of this reprobated measure. Mr. C. said that he might extend his observations much farther on this most important subject; but so much had been well said by others that he would abstain. He must however present to the House a reason which he believed had not as yet been touched on; he meant the happy effect, which an adequate compensation would have on the tone of parties in our country. Make a seat in Congress, what it ought to be, the first post in the community, next to the Presidency, and men of the greatest distinction in any part of the country will seek it. The post then of honor and distinction being in the people, and not in the President, will be open to all parties in proportion to their ascendancy in the Union. That entire monopoly of honor and public profit by the majority will not be experienced, which must be felt, when the honors of the country are principally in the hands of the Chief Magistrate. Those who best understand our nature can the most fully appreciate the consequences. Although it may not abate the heat of party, it will greatly affect their feelings towards our happy political institutions.

Mr. CALHOUN, was followed by Mr. WHEATON.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, said, the question before the House was not that of refunding, confession, pardon, or absolution. He had no confessions to make, or pardon to ask; he had received no instruction from his constituents, and therefore stood on independent ground. The question, he understood, was on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole, to fill the blank with six dollars. In Committee he had the honor to move to fill the blank with that sum; and although he considered the decision of the question doubtful, yet he hoped the House would sustain the report, as, notwithstanding all that honorable gentlemen had said against it, he was not ashamed of his motion; nor shall I, said Mr. S., abandon it, until a majority of this House shall decide against it.

Mr. S. said, he understood that the primary object of the members who advocated the compensation law, was to bring into Congress men of the first talents in the nation, and to retain them there. Did I believe, said Mr. S., that high salaries would have that effect, perhaps I might unite with them in the measure, but, having always entertained a different opinion, must beg leave to dissent from them.

Gentlemen had said that, unless the wages of members were raised, the best men in the Legislature would be induced to leave Congress and accept of Executive appointments. Mr. S. said, he had no kind of objection that the President should induce men of the best talents in Congress to leave it, and fill more important appointments—such as Judges of the Supreme Court, Heads of Departments, Ministers Plenipotentiary to foreign nations, &c. When men came into Congress, from private or rather obscure circles, and were found to possess pre-eminent talents and qualifications, and particularly qualified for some important office, it was proper that they should be called to fill those offices for which they were so well qualified. How should the Executive otherwise become acquainted with men of talents? He could not know them until they appeared in public. Mr. Speaker, before I sit down I will endeavor to assign a reason for the opinion I have advanced, and also very briefly state some of the motives that induced me to vote against the passage of the compensation bill, and which will have a commanding influence on my mind in determining the vote that I shall now give.

Soon after the organization of this Government, Congress passed a law to pay its members six dollars per day. This act was passed in the year 1789, and expired by its own limitation in 1796, when Congress again took up the subject of pay, and two propositions were discussed, one for an annual salary, the other a per diem allowance of six dollars—the latter prevailed. Some of our citizens had considered the wages of the members too high, and had petitioned Congress to reduce their pay. Gold and silver was then the main currency of our country, and, as the wages were by some of our citizens deemed extravagant, murmuring and discontent prevailed amongst the people. But it soon subsided, and Government went on well, and men of talents and useful information formed the councils of our nation; whether it was interest, honor, or patriotism, or all of them combined, he should not pretend to ascertain.

Mr. S. said it was an undeniable fact that, from the year 1796, the date of the six dollar act, to the year 1816, Congress had never been deficient in talents; and, sir, I speak it with pleasure and some degree of national pride, that, in my humble opinion, I have never witnessed within the walls of Congress Hall more men of brilliant and useful talents than I see this day within these walls. Sir, during the term of twenty years the pay of the members of Congress has been six dollars per diem; and the scenes through which we have passed, prove that the Legislature of the United States has been competent to all the purposes of Government. Europe has been convulsed to its centre, and America has felt the shock, but is now settled down into a peaceful calm.

Thus Government went on well for the space of twenty years; and I did believe, and do still believe, that it was bad policy to pass any law that would tend to interrupt or mar that mutual confidence that had so long subsisted between the people and their Representatives.

Notwithstanding the able and lucid report of the committee on that subject, Mr. S. said he retained the same opinion that he did when the compensation bill passed the House, and said he was the more confirmed that his first impressions were right, from what had since taken place; for the law had been denounced from Georgia to Maine—from one end of the continent to the other—not only by mobs and factions, as had been represented by some members of this House, but by Legislatures in solemn form, and grand jurors around the altars of justice. Sir, the people have been too much irritated and agitated by misrepresentation and falsehood, and I am sorry to say that a lying spirit has gone forth, striving in its course to fasten ignominy on the foes of the law, as well as on its friends; and such has been its effect, that I will venture to say that not a member in this House has escaped censure in a greater or less degree—not even the President of the United States has escaped. One thing, sir, we are well assured of, the voice of the great mass of the people has been strongly and clearly expressed, and I regret that any portion of our citizens should have been styled a faction for having freely expressed their opinion on a subject in which they feel so much interest.

Mr. S. said, he regarded the voice of the man at his cart and his plough, as much as he did the voice of him who riots in luxury and rolls in his gilded trappings. Sir, our Government is Republican, and founded on the opinion of the People; the yeomanry, the mechanic, and laborer, feel a deep and lively interest in the measures of Government, and Government has a dependent interest on them—for the King himself is selved of the field, and the strength of the Prince is his people.

Mr. S. said, that it is well known that money is by no means of the same value that it was twenty years ago, and he was well assured that many honorable members of this House make a great sacrifice, when they leave their professions, occupations, and domestic concerns; but he considered it as a free-will offering, and their constituents and their country would hold their services in grateful remembrance when their heads are laid in the dust.

Sir, said Mr. S., we have a considerable national debt to pay; times are hard in various parts of the country; taxes are high, money scarce, and but little or no produce to carry to market. The tide of popular opinion is running strong against high salaries, and extravagance of every kind. But, notwithstanding this is the case, the people are willing to pay the public debt, even if it were ten times as much as it really is. The glorious achievements of the late war have sealed the destinies of this country, perhaps for centuries to come, and the Treaty of Ghent has secured our liberties, and established our national independence, and placed this nation on high and honorable ground.

Mr. S. said, influenced by considerations like these he had mentioned, he voted against the passage of the compensation act, without the least hesitation, from a full conviction of the impropriety of the measure, and now felt himself bound for the same reasons to vote for a repeal of the law, and in favor of the report of the Committee of the Whole, and to bring back the pay to six dollars.

Mr. S. said he had not been instructed by his constituents, but did believe that his opinion on this subject coincided with the public will, and, therefore, was uninfluenced by anything contrary to his own judgment; nor had the Legislature of New Jersey instructed their Senators, or required their Representatives to do anything on this subject. They were attending to their concerns, leaving Congress to transact their own business in their own way.

One observation more. In regard to information given to the House a few days since by the honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in his speech on the subject, he observed, that wheat in Baltimore was selling for three dollars and a quarter a bushel, and therefore contended that the wages of members ought to be raised. Sir, I draw a very different conclusion from the fact. God, in his providence, has been pleased, in a great measure, to blast our crop of grain, and perhaps where there is one to bring bread to market, there may be one hundred to buy. Thus dear and scarce, how are the poor to obtain it? But have it they must. He hoped the report of the Committee of the Whole would be agreed to.

Mr. COLPEPER said, after the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) so full of good sense and sound reasoning, he certainly would vote on this subject without making any remarks, if he had given a silent vote on the passage of the compensation bill last session; but having spoken and voted for it at that time, he rose to express his opinion on the present occasion. Every man in public life, said Mr. C., has, or should have, some guide, by which his conduct is directed in the discharge of his public duties. But two rules have ever been recommended; first, the judgment and conscience of the Representative; and, second, the opinion of his constituents, or their instructions.

To ascertain the most correct rule, and firmly adhere to it, has been an object of primary importance with me; and, although I may not have formed a correct and proper rule, I have found one which my judgment approves, and from which I have never intentionally departed, and I hope I never shall; and I claim the indulgence of the House till I describe this rule, and offer some of my reasons for the votes I expect to give upon the bill now before us.

More has been said, in the course of debate upon this subject, both for and against the right of the people to instruct their Representatives, and the obligation of the Representatives to obey, than I can subscribe to. Under every form of government, and especially such a government as ours, formed by the whole community, for the mutual benefit of the people and their rulers, and conducted by men selected from the mass of society, public opinion will have, and should have great force. It will not only influence the conduct of individuals in a community, but the formation of its laws. Unity of interest and mutual confidence in the people and their rulers, is the strongest cement in political society, and surest guarantee of civil liberty; and it is both the interest and the duty of legislators to cherish that confidence. A desire to avoid the censure, or gain the applause of the public, is a laudable one; few sacrifices are too great to make to public opinion; and legislators may usually conform their systems to what the humor of the people will bear; but the right of judging what is proper and just, never should be resigned, and, if asked, should be resisted with firmness. Rulers should pursue a correct, consistent, fair, and honorable course, and never surrender their own judgment to popular opinion; they should conscientiously oppose what they deem to be injurious to society, and give the public information upon every important subject of legislation, to prepare them to judge correctly; then, and not till then, public opinion may be expected to produce its best effects. Whether this is not true, let those who are accustomed to view men and things with an impartial eye, determine, and they will find that falsehood and misrepresentation, if believed to be true, have all the effects of the most solemn and important truths. These effects are not confined to the thoughtless and ignorant, but extend to the whole mass of society—to the best of men. This has never been more apparent than in the effects produced by the compensation bill of last session. And what caused this great excitement?

This country has long been divided into two great political parties, and both have their party printers, who are fond of exercising all the influence they possess. Both parties seized the compensation bill, as a measure that would produce murmuring and discontent, and attempted to wield it to their advantage. The Republicans charged it to the Federalists; because, said they, although more Republicans than Federalists voted for it, yet a greater proportion of Federalists than Republicans supported it. This is unquestionably true; but whether it proceeded from grovelling avarice, or honorable independence, I leave the public to determine. The Federalists charged it to the Republicans, and said, gentlemen, you have a great majority, and never lose a bill you desire should pass, nor suffer a bill to pass except you desire it. This is as certainly true; but whether they were in this single case overruled by the minority, or wished the passage of a bill they were unwilling to vote for, I will not say. One thing I can say, and I assert it without fear of contradiction, that, in the Committee of the Whole, where no record is kept of the votes, not more than twenty-two or twenty-three voted against the bill, and most of that number had too much respect for the majority to say one word against the bill, but rose in their place to be counted. What arguments they heard, or what reasons they had to vote against it in the House, I know not; but when the ayes and noes were called for, sixty-seven recorded their names against the bill, and many others either could not or would not vote for it.

Posterity will decide who acted the most firm and consistent part: those who voted for it in Committee and against it in the House, or those who supported it from first to last. For, unimportant as this measure was of itself, the public clamor and our conduct here, has made it interesting and important, and we have immortalized our names.

I voted for the bill, and I do not regret it; nor do I lament the passage of the bill. I believed it just to increase the compensation, and determined to act a firm and consistent part. I did not shrink from my share of the responsibility. I could not desert the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) who, when he reported that bill, expected the support of four-fifths, if not nine-tenths, of the members, in its passage through the House.

But to return to the party printers. When, too late, they and the party candidates discovered their mistake, and found this weapon, like a two-edged sword in unskilful hands, which cut both friends and foes; they perceived they could not stop the machine, and it produced effects they never intended; it raised a great cry against the bill, and produced more excitement than any other measure of the General Government. Nothing would justify a description of these effects, if public opinion was not urged as a reason for repealing the bill, and reducing the compensation to six dollars per day, contrary to the deliberate judgment of a great majority of this House. But as this is urged, and gentlemen have informed us what their immediate constituents have said and done upon this subject, I may be permitted to relate what came under my notice.

My constituents gave me no instructions upon the subject. They did, as individuals, complain not only of the mode, but, what they called, the great amount of the compensation. A learned and respectable clergyman said to me, "we never can expect to pay our public debt, all the taxes will be required to pay the salary of members; the revenue collected in this district (and it is supposed to be from sixty to ninety thousand dollars) will be necessary to pay Mr. Culpeper."

I asked him, how did you obtain that information? He replied, a person, and I think he named a Judge of the Supreme Court, made the calculation, and it amounted to nearly thirty thousand dollars per day. I rejoined, do you understand the subject, and know what you say? Do you know the difference between what we formerly received, and what we now receive under the compensation bill of last session? He said, not precisely, but it must be very great. I then informed him that during the two years of the thirteenth Congress, I received under the old law $2,994; that during the two years of the fourteenth Congress, if I attended every day, I should receive $3,000 and my travelling pay. And I appeal to God as a witness of truth, and to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who paid the money, for the truth of this story respecting the money I received, and which I expect to receive. The gentleman then said, if the difference was but two or three hundred dollars, it was improper to make so much noise about it, and the friends of the measure should have furnished correct information, and prevented such mistakes.

Now, sir, when such men as these make such mistakes, no wonder that honest, good, and correct men murmur; but I cannot, I will not believe my constituents are unwilling to give me a just compensation for my services. I presume all that is necessary is, to ascertain what is just. I have formed an opinion for myself, and I firmly believe every man who attends this place as a legislator, should receive what will support him and his wife, if he has one, and is disposed to bring her with him; and if he leaves his family at home, he should receive an honorable support, and a sum sufficient to remunerate his family for the loss of his services.

I may be told, the public is not bound to support our wives; this I admit, but we are bound to support them, and how will we do it, when in the public service, if it requires the whole of our compensation to support ourselves? A lady who marries a man without both the disposition and the means of maintaining her, acts very injudiciously; and the old book informs us, he that provides not for his own, hath denied the faith, and I have no doubt that he is worse than an infidel, both in politics and religion.

But a few words upon the right of instruction. The people have certainly a right to express their opinions, and I trust I shall be ready to give the voice of the people, its fair, its full and Constitutional force, if given as advice; but I think, however, my constituents have not attempted to instruct me, and, should they do it, and should the Legislature of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, attempt it; and even if every State Legislature in the Union should attempt to bind me by instructions; I would reject their instructions, and disobey their orders if contrary to the opinions I had deliberately formed.

The rule by which my conduct is directed is this, to attend constantly; this I have done and never lost a day in six years, either through bad weather, sickness, or neglect. To meet every subject of legislation fairly, to weigh arguments and opinions in the country, and on this floor, impartially; and then vote as my judgment and conscience directs, and to the best of my knowledge discharge the duties I owe to my God, my country, myself, and my family, regardless of consequences. My conduct has been directed by this rule. I voted for the compensation bill and I do not regret it. I am differently situated from most of the gentlemen who have spoken on this subject; I have not passed the ordeal, my constituents have not yet passed upon my conduct, but, if I live till next August, I expect to afford an opportunity of deciding it in a Constitutional way. I shall then ascertain whether they approve or disapprove of my determination to act as my judgment and conscience dictates. I love my constituents; their confidence and approbation, I trust, will ever be properly appreciated by me. I esteem them for their love of justice, and cannot presume they desire me to serve them without a just compensation; my respect for them has nothing of fear in it. I hope my confidence in them, and regard for them, will remain unshaken, but could I know they were unwilling to do me justice, it would very much diminish my confidence. But I presume they do not blame us for receiving an adequate compensation for our services, but charge us with greatly increasing our pay. Let us examine the propriety of this charge. I admit we have increased the nominal sum, but not the intrinsic value of our pay. This may be illustrated by the practice of the bakers, and occupants of boarding-houses in this city. Formerly flour was five or six dollars per barrel, then the five-penny loaf would feed two men; now flour is fourteen or fifteen dollars, and the bakers have not increased the price of the loaf, but diminished the loaf; now, two or three loaves are necessary for one hearty man. So, sir, with your compensation twenty years ago, twenty cents would purchase a dinner, for which you now have to pay one dollar, and every other other article has risen in nearly the same ratio; and yet we are told we have increased our pay—we have in name, but not in value.

Can any gentleman in this House say the pay we now receive is equal in value to the pay of members under the six dollar law fifteen years ago? or will any gentleman say he believes six dollars per day is a just compensation? If any gentleman does think it is, I hope he will say so, but I presume no gentleman will hazard such an opinion. And are we to be proscribed for doing what all admit to be just? I trust not. I am willing to serve my constituents as long as I am their choice, and they are willing to allow me what will support myself and wife, and not one day longer; for patriotism never brought me here, and I presume it never did any man. I trust we have patriots in this House. I hope I have a patriotic feeling, but our constituents never sent us here as mere patriots, they chose us as legislators, as politicians, and we should legislate as our judgment and conscience direct. This is my course, and when my constituents know my situation, and appreciate my motive, I trust they will approve my conduct. To them I am responsible for the manner in which I have discharged my public duties, but by them I never can be directed, or forced to violate my conscience, or abandon my duty; and if it is my misfortune to lose their confidence, by exercising what to me appears a sound discretion, and discharging what I deem to be my duty, I shall never regret my course, I shall enjoy peace of mind, and feel the support of an approving conscience.

A few words respecting the bill before us, and I shall close my remarks.

If the House refuse to concur with the Committee of the Whole, and will fix the daily pay at eight or nine dollars, I will vote for it. If they will so amend the bill as to repeal the compensation act, and leave next Congress to fix their compensation, I will vote for it. But if the blank is filled with six dollars per day, I cannot vote for it. I receive ten dollars this year. I believe it to be just. I have no idea the repealing bill will take effect in time to affect the amount of my compensation, but after receiving ten dollars, I never can, I never will vote to limit my successor to six dollars, if I stand alone.

Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania, said, when he offered a few observations, some days since, on this question, the principle he had chiefly in view escaped his memory. It was the great importance of the members giving punctual attendance in their places, and this had been overlooked in the discussion. Unless this is accomplished, in a competent degree, said Mr. F., representation is but a shadow, or rather the name of it is a deception. I do not mean that the number of Representatives ought to be increased; they are, in my opinion, so much too numerous already, that in this way the expense is more increased than any reasonable increase of salary would do; but I complain of the non-attendance of members who are elected, and which must necessarily be unequally from different parts of the nation. The question of compensation, whether by salary or by the day, is of no importance, otherwise than as far as it secures the attendance of the members; short of this, it is in a manner thrown away; and it is certain that the employment and expense of living differ very much from each other in different States; hence it was that under the diplomatic government of the Confederation, when each State had to pay its own members out of the respective State treasuries, they paid at very different rates—some a fourth, some a third, and some a half more than others; and hence it was, that when patriotism, in opposition to interest, ceased to operate, Congress was scarcely attended by a quorum, to do important business, one month in the year. Indeed, we are told that honor will supply the want of adequate compensation. The capricious principle of honor, and the more noble principle of patriotism, has often done great things; but that, when set in opposition to interest, they cannot be permanently depended on, is made evident by the history of our Revolution; nor in opposition to interest ought they to be calculated on, in time of peace, when all the citizens are protected in pursuing every one of them their own interest. The Representatives having a common interest with their constituents, is the great security of Republican Government; of honor and patriotism there may be, and often are, great professions, where there is but little reality; the true patriot is willing to pay well, in order to be well served.

It is well known that the National Government was the result of liberal compromise, and that so were the laws, also, by which it was put in operation, and among others the law fixing the compensation of members of Congress; and, as has been mentioned by the venerable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) who was well acquainted with those times, this compensation was determined at a time when many of the sages and statesmen who conducted us through the Revolution, and who sat in the national or ratifying convention, or in both, were members; many of whose names and characters do honor to their country, and who understood the principles of the National Constitution well. It was fixed at a medium between the highest and the lowest that the States respectively had given; but knowing the changeableness of the value of money, they fixed it so as to expire soon after the representation was equalized by the first census. When it expired, by its own operation, about twenty years since, it was renewed at the same rate, as I mentioned formerly, by a small majority.

While Congress possessed only the very limited powers vested by the Confederation, the small and weak States were really oppressed. They were called on for their due proportion of requisitions, which they were not able to pay. They, with difficulty, were able to bear the expense of their own State governments, and this was increased by being obliged to compensate their members in Congress, in which the small States had as many members as the large ones, but they were not able to give such a compensation as would insure attendance. To those States, the provision in the Federal Government, that all compensation should be paid out of the National Treasury, and determined by the National Legislature, was an incalculable advantage, and still is so, to new and weak States; therefore, as may be well remembered, the small States ratified the Constitution without delay, while the large States took much longer time to deliberate. In short, there is not a Government in the world in which so much provision is made for the strong bearing the burdens of the weak.

Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House is, are six dollars of the present currency equal in value for any of the purposes of life to what they were twenty-seven years since, or even twenty? I have not indeed heard that in words this is asserted; yet the opposition that is given to such an increase of compensation as would be equal in value to what it was at first implies so much. The professed ground of opposition is, however, that it is contrary to public opinion. To make public opinion a rule, we ought to be certain that the public mind was well informed. I will admit, however, that the novelty of turning the day wages into a salary, and not proportioning it to the length of the session, is opposed by public opinion in many places. But that the propriety of an increase of compensation, in some proportion to the decreased value of the currency, is not against, but perfectly corresponding with public opinion, is evidenced by the most unequivocal testimony. Ask the farmer if he will sell the produce of his farm at the same price he would have done above twenty years ago? They will all answer universally, no. Ask the smith, the tailor, the weaver, &c., will they work for you at the same rate they did at that period? They will, one and all, answer no. Ask those who keep tavern or boarding-houses, and they will give the same answer. This seems a much more correct method of collecting the public opinion than from stump orators or newspaper declaimers, which I hear mentioned, but with none of whom am I acquainted.

But there is another method of collecting public opinion equally infallible. The State Legislatures are the official repositories of public opinion. Ask them, and they will refer you to their laws, by which they have decided, in their own case, that six dollars now is far short of being equal to what it was when the wages of Congress were fixed; some of them at least have decided that it is but half the value.

Mr. Speaker, the compensation of members of Congress is of no further use than as it secures the attendance of members. That it has not secured that attendance, as well for several years past as formerly, will be evident to all who examine the journals. The House has, indeed, the power of compelling the attendance of members, but that power is impracticable as to any general purpose. Pennsylvania formerly exacted a heavy fine for non-attendance, but it was seldom levied—easy apologies were admitted. As their attendance is essential to the well being of the Government, it is certainly best to make it their interest to attend by such a compensation as they had when the Government was organized. This has been long known by my friends to be my own opinion. While I was unable to attend the House last session, I perused the journals at home, and found that there was often a thin House deciding important measures, even on this compensation law which has made so much noise; and on the law for compensating property lost or destroyed, which produced so many mistakes, there were from a fifth to a fourth of the members absent, and on many other important questions a much greater proportion, sometimes nearly one-half. As this is the last session of Congress in which I will ever be, I can have but little interest in the fate of the question further than the public good is concerned, and of this I hope not to lose sight when retired from public life.

Mr. PICKERING observed, that yesterday he had hastily made a few remarks on the subject under consideration, at the moment when the question was to be put on an amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia before him, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) He would now add a few more. The comparative value of the compensation to members of Congress, as fixed in 1789, and that by the law of the last session, deserved a more explicit statement.

Taking the average length of the sessions of Congress at five months, or 150 days, and the real value of the compensation of 1789 to be double (and it was certainly more than double) the value of the same nominal sum in 1816, the result of the comparison would be this: 150 days, at $12 - - - - - $1,800

The average travel of members to the Seat of Government, 400 miles, at 20 miles for a day, and the same in return, together 40 days, at $12 - - - - - 480

Making the average compensation to a member of Congress in 1789 equal, in the money of 1816, to - - - - - $2,280

In 1816, the law allowed a salary of - 1,500
But left the allowance for travel at the original nominal sum of six dollars for every 20 miles; consequently, the 40 days travel give only - - - - - 240

Total value of the compensation in 1816 $1,740
Or less in value than members received in 1789, by $540, in the money of 1816. Yet the clamor has been excited by an alleged increase, as well as a change in the mode of compensation.

But the time when this supposed increase was enacted, has been pronounced improper and unpropitious—just when the country had emerged from an expensive war, and the people were burdened with taxes. But what was the case in 1789? Six years, indeed, had elapsed from the close of a seven years' war, but its distressing consequences remained. We had no national Government of force to relieve the country from those distresses; hence commerce and all other branches of industry languished. A debt (the sacred debt of the Revolution, the price of our independence) of more than seventy millions remained unpaid. The public revenue was then incipient; and the whole receipts from commerce in 1789, and the two following years united, amounted to but about six millions and a half of dollars; whereas the revenue from the same source, in the single year of 1816, amounted to about twenty millions of dollars; and the entire revenue from the customs and other sources, in that one year, amounted to about thirty millions, at the same time the public debt was stated at about one hundred and twenty millions. Since the year 1789, the population of the United States has more than doubled; the wealth of the people is trebled; and the style of decent living (in addition to the increase of prices) become vastly more expensive.

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

But the public voice has been raised against the law of the last session! Yes, a lying spirit had gone forth (as one gentleman had said) and deceived the people. From every part of the House, gentlemen had ascribed the public clamor to artifice and intrigue. Some Federalists, (and they probably began the outcry,) remembering the charge of extravagance formerly made as one means to undermine the Federal Administration, and the "odious" compensation law, having a democratic origin, those Federalists seized the occasion to attack their political adversaries with their own weapon. Others denounced the law in order to render unpopular those who voted for it, or who availed themselves of its provisions, and thus to supplant them in the public favor, and step into their places. Others joined in the clamor, to be in the fashion, or to acquire some stock of popularity for future use. Others, again, and those alone whose opinions deserve attention, honestly disapproved of the law, because uninformed, or misinformed, as to the merits of the question. Since the publication of the able and clear report of the committee on the subject, such men had become satisfied that the measure was correct. One instance was presented in a letter to a member of this House, written on another subject, and in which this matter of the compensation was mentioned incidentally. It is a letter from an honest and intelligent sailor, who now lives in the country, in Pennsylvania, probably as a farmer. He says, "I consider, from the committee's report on the compensation law, that it should not be repealed, but I thought otherwise until I seriously perused the solid, distinct, and clear report thereon." Had that report gone forth with the law, no such clamor as we have witnessed would have been raised, and we should not now be debating the question.

Mr. P. said, we have heard something about patriotism on this occasion, but there was no room for it on this subject. He trusted no gentleman would take offence, if he said that patriotism had not brought a single member into that House; that there was, in truth, no more reason that men should labor for the public than for individuals, without being paid for it; and the compensation should comport with the high and important nature of the services to be performed. As to the power to fix the compensation of members, it had been repeatedly stated that it is expressly granted to Congress by the Constitution; and it was right that Congress should always possess this power, in order (as in all other things) to adapt the laws to the state and circumstances of the times. Let, then, the compensation law be left as it now stands—an inheritance to our successors. If they commit waste upon it, or throw it away, let them be responsible for the consequences.

A few words on instructions to members of Congress. Mr. P. said, he had received instructions from the Legislature of Massachusetts, in which the compensation law is censured; as changing the mode and greatly increasing the compensation to members of Congress—as an innovation upon the custom, and not congenial with the republican principles of our Government; and requesting the Senators and Representatives from that State to use their influence to effect its repeal. He had shown that the compensation had not been increased; that it is really of less value than it was in 1789. And as to its being an innovation, the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FINDLEY) had informed us that the idea of a salary compensation was not a novel one. For, that in 1796, when an increase of the compensation was under consideration in Congress, it was proposed to change it from a daily to an annual compensation; though neither one nor the other was then accomplished. As to instructions, whether from the Legislatures or the people of a district, Mr. P. did not admit their validity. If they contain reasons for or against any measure, these will merit a respectful consideration—but instructions unaccompanied by reasons, were not entitled to the observance of Representatives. He felt humbled that the Legislature of Massachusetts should have descended to this small business; especially as it was one exclusively intrusted to Congress by the Constitution. If, on any important public measure, a State Legislature think proper to express their sentiments, with their reasons, and especially if a national measure operate unequally, the State aggrieved will rightfully remonstrate, and instruct its Representatives accordingly. If the case be clear, they will of course obey; if it be doubtful, the opinion of their constituents will turn the scale. But they should go no farther, because they are bound not to contravene the general welfare for any partial or local interests.

Mr. P. would say one word more on patriotism. The only patriotism belonging to this subject is that which, by providing liberal compensations for the service, shall induce those who best understand, and are most able to promote, the great interests of our country to accept of seats in Congress. To bring forth such men, he wished the law to remain as it is.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, that the dignity and importance of a seat in this House was estimated more highly by none, not even the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) than by himself. It is, said Mr. T., a station worthy the exalted ambition of the ablest statesmen in this country; no man, although retiring from the Executive Chair of the Union, crowned with the benediction and gratitude of his fellow-citizens, would be dishonored by a seat on this floor. To discharge the various and arduous duties of a Representative in Congress, requires not only incorruptible integrity, but talents of a very superior order. The subjects presented for debate and legislation are equal to the highest and most refined intellect, stimulated by patriotic ardor and persevering industry. The people of the United States are represented no where but in this House. It is for this cause, that every officer in every department of the Government, from the President down to the messenger who distributes these bills upon our tables, is answerable to this authority for the faithful discharge of his duties. Here the voice of the people is, ought to be, and ever will be heard, while one spark of liberty remains to our country. May the day never arrive when their seats shall be occupied by weak, wicked, and ignorant men.

Honorable gentlemen have told us that they were, and still are, in favor of the compensation law of last session, from a conviction that it is calculated to command for the service of this House, better talents than could be procured at the former rate of compensation. Most, if not all of their arguments, are founded on this supposition. Let us, for a few minutes, inquire into its truth. And here I am willing in the outset to admit, that since my first acquaintance with this House, it has lost some of its brightest ornaments, because they could not afford to sacrifice private pursuits to public employment. But do gentlemen believe that fifteen hundred dollars a year would have secured to us their services? No, sir, it would not. Some of them have returned to the practice of lucrative professions, yielding an income of five, eight, or ten thousand dollars a year, and in several instances I am informed of a still larger sum. Some have accepted profitable and permanent offices under the State governments, and others, fatigued with public cares, have sought, in domestic quiet, that happiness which political pursuits failed to afford. I know of no man who has retired from this House because the pay was but six dollars a day, who would have remained at fifteen hundred dollars a year. The addition to the compensation made by the law of last session is much less than it appears to be considered either in this House or out of it. The members of the first Congress, who paid themselves six dollars a day, actually received, besides travelling expenses, more than fifteen hundred dollars a year. For the two years they received for their services, besides the usual travelling allowances, three thousand and ninety dollars. The members of the fifth Congress received, in like manner, about twelve hundred and seventy-eight dollars per annum, and the members of the twelfth and thirteenth Congresses, something more than eleven hundred dollars per annum. During these eight years, Congress was in session longer than usual, but the average compensation received by members of Congress, at six dollars a day, from the organization of the Government under the present Constitution, to the commencement of the last session, is little, if any, short of one thousand dollars per annum. With an increased population and territory, we ought to calculate on a proportionate increase of legislative business, the despatch of which will not be accelerated by the augmented numbers in this House. It, therefore, may, and probably will happen, that we, or those who are to occupy these seats after us, will sometimes receive more money at six dollars a day than at fifteen hundred dollars a year. But should it be otherwise—should this country happily enjoy domestic tranquillity and public repose, in so great a degree as to require the sessions of Congress to be protracted not much beyond the average which they have heretofore attained—I put it to honorable gentlemen who hear me whether they would be influenced to continue in, or to abandon, the service of their country in this House, because they might receive, as a compensation for that service, three or four hundred dollars a year more or less. No, sir, they would not; I should wrong their highminded and patriotic feelings by a contrary supposition. I see around me honorable members devoting undivided attention to their public duties, submitting to painful and almost innumerable privations, for a pecuniary compensation, less by four-fold than the same capacity and application would insure in their professional employments. These gentlemen are my witnesses that it is not necessary to pay great wages for the purpose of bringing distinguished talents into this House.

Several venerable members have spoken of the improved character of Congress for political and general science within a few years past. I can draw a comparison only between this and the thirteenth Congress. Many able men were returned to both. This Congress has lost by some changes, while it has gained by others—I am unable to strike a balance. But let gentlemen remember that the talent and integrity which have done honor to either the one or the other, furnish no argument in favor of the compensation law. We both were elected, and took our seats as laborers by the day; and although there may not have been any falling off, yet I am unable to discover any improvement in the manner of doing business since we became salary men. If the members of this and the last Congress have been characterized by rather more ability than some of their predecessors, it ought to be ascribed to the important and critical times, in which they were elected. Similar times will always produce the same result, whether the compensation be high or low.

It has never been the policy of this Government to pay persons employed in its service, particularly in the legislative department, as profusely as professional men, especially of the law, are paid for their services in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Any midling clerk in the office of a county court lawyer, can there earn for his master, by the folio, twelve or fifteen dollars a day. But who ever thought of graduating the compensation to members of Congress by that standard! Much less by one formed with reference to the fees allowed to counsellors of respectable standing. Agriculturists constitute the predominant class of our population, and the pay allowed to members of the Legislature, in both the General and State governments, has been in most instances, and always ought to be, fixed with a view to the profits of agricultural industry.

Much has been said on the subject of instructions. I have received from my immediate constituents neither instruction nor advice. But I am not the less acquainted with their wishes on this subject. The salary law is by them unanimously disapproved. Every man of every political party, from first to last, has condemned it. From the industrious farmer, who honors and benefits his country, down to the despicable wretch who lives by his wits, eating the bread of extortion or idleness; through the long list of intermediate character, not one stood forth its advocate. It was discussed in town meetings, and condemned. Committees were appointed to meet in county convention, where it was again discussed and condemned. I was present at none of these meetings. But from the newspapers I learn that a memorial praying its repeal was agreed to, for the purpose of being submitted to this House. It has not been received. These meetings were held without distinction of party. Not on the eve of an election, and for electioneering purposes, but months after the polls were closed, and after the law had been published, and well understood. All classes of society united in these proceedings; they were not stimulated by demagogues, for the purpose of pulling down or building up any man, but were so conducted as to furnish to my mind satisfactory evidence that the deliberate judgment of my immediate constituents is opposed to the salary law. I thought proper to mention these proceedings, although not regularly, before this House, because there is no other way of ascertaining what is public opinion but by receiving and combining the opinions of the people in the several districts from which we come.

An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) who yesterday favored us with one of his happiest specimens of public speaking, and entertained, if he did not convince, his hearers, considered this as a contest between Congress and the people—between the representative and the constituent; and he hoped this House would manfully maintain the ground assumed by it at the last session. Has the honorable gentleman forgotten the lesson of experience? Let him look into the history, not only of this, but of all free governments, and point, if he can, to one example of a contest between the people and the Government in which the latter have been successful. If such example can be produced, the success of the Government was purchased at the price of the liberty of the country. While the people are free they will and ought to govern. I feel no humiliation while avowing that I stand here to express for my constituents, and as their representative, what they themselves would express if personally present, and possessed of the same information upon which I act.

But I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts that this is a contest between Congress and the people. That gentleman, and those who voted with him, doubtless believed that they were promoting the public good in passing the compensation law of last session. They expected, if not the gratitude, at least the support of the people. Such, I know, were the feelings of many gentlemen who supported it. In this expectation they have been disappointed. It remains for them to decide whether they will now commence a contest against, or fulfil, the wishes of the people. The citizens of the country are its owners and sovereigns—we are only their stewards. They have disapproved of the law. Is it not more honorable to us, and more consistent with the principles of this Government, to obey their will, when clearly expressed, than to persevere in a course which has met their decided condemnation?

Among my regrets, occasioned by the passage of the compensation law of last session, it was not the least, that the motives of honorable members who voted for it would be liable to unjust imputations. Subsequent events have too fully proved the correctness of that anticipation. Some of our ablest and best men have lost the confidence of their constituents, and been driven from the councils of the nation, in consequence of one error. Let us correct it without delay. Let us remove from the statute book this cause of public dissatisfaction; and let all remember that it is unworthy the exalted character of American citizens to pursue with unrelenting severity their faithful servants for one error of judgment. Let mistakes on both sides be forgotten and forgiven, that harmony and confidence may be restored between the people and their representatives.

I voted against the compensation law of last session, because, in my judgment, it was unnecessary and inexpedient. My opinion remains unchanged. I shall now vote to repeal it, and to fix the pay of members of Congress at the old price of six dollars a day.

Mr. WILDE said, he never thought of that House without comparing it in his own mind to a vast, grand, magnificent, political amphitheatre, on which were exhibited specimens of intellectual gladiatorship, infinitely more wonderful, quite as interesting, and sometimes scarcely less dangerous, (he would not say cruel,) than those that contributed to the amusement of ancient Rome; or rather—for he wished to make no comparison which should not be expressive of his high respect for that body, and for every member of it—to a gay and gallant tournament, where the "keen encounter of wits" was substituted for that of weapons; where sarcasm and ridicule were the sword and the lance, authority and argument the casque and the shield.

Thinking thus, it was not for him, he said, all unskilful as he was in such contests, and in comparison with able and honorable gentlemen whom he saw around him, scarcely entitled to knightly privileges, it was not for him to descend into the arena or to enter into the lists for the purpose of combatting their arguments, or running a tilt against their opinions. There would be no equal ity in such a contest. They would come against him, clad in all the panoply of intellectual warfare, whilst he had no other weapons than those which nature furnished; and so humble had been the current of his life, as scarcely to have polished the pebble that must be fitted to his hand. He meant no vain-glorious allusion; he begged leave to disclaim it. He was not conscious, until he had uttered them, that his words would bear any such construction; and he was sensible that there was no more similarity between himself and one of the persons to whom it might be supposed he had referred, than there was between any honorable gentleman on whom his eye might accidentally have rested at the moment and the other. Gentlemen would have another advantage over him. They were trained to the forms of debate; with all its refinements they were perfectly acquainted. Language was with them a weapon of the keenest edge, the finest temper, the highest polish, and wielded with the most admirable dexterity. But its brilliancy was so often flashed upon the eye, that sometimes, when it was only meant to dazzle, we become apprehensive lest it was intended to wound.

It was not without reluctance he had exposed himself, defenceless, in front of a force so formidable. He had determined to do as he had done at the last session: he then expressed his opinion only by his vote, and nothing which had since occurred out of that House would have induced him to express his opinion otherwise now. But a reference had been made to the public opinion of the State to which he belonged, and to the recent election there, as furnishing conclusive evidence that this opinion was decisively against any increase whatever of the remuneration of members of the National Legislature. This reference had called him up. He begged leave to correct an inference which he had considered as a reflection, not only upon the liberality, but on the good sense of that State, and which, so far as he was informed, he believed to be erroneous. He did not believe the public opinion there—and by this he meant the calm, deliberate opinion of reasonable men, which, if not now the opinion of the majority, (and he was by no means certain that it was not,) would very soon become so;—he did not think that this opinion was opposed to a reasonable addition to the sum formerly allowed to members of Congress, if made in the shape of a daily compensation. Unless he was grossly deceived, (and he had no reason to think he was so,) two at least of the gentlemen then elected, (and he was happy to state it, to their honor,) so far from objecting to an increase of the former daily allowance, would vote for it, if called upon. Others, perhaps, might do the same. He did not say they would not.

An honorable gentleman, formerly a member of this House, and recently elected by the Legislature of that State to the other, would (unless he had been misinformed) most probably vote for an increase also. He had not conversed with any respectable and intelligent man in the State who wished to limit the members of this House to a sum which they found inadequate to their decent support, and which was universally admitted to be much less in value than when originally fixed, twenty years ago. With these facts before his eyes, Mr. W. said, he could not at present be persuaded that the inference which was attempted to be drawn from the result of the election there was well founded.

So far as it regarded himself, that result was produced by complicated causes. Independent of those which it was apparent to the House must always operate against him, there were others that had contributed to his rejection. Among these, was the part he had the honor to take—he should always consider it an honor—in a late memorable contest in that State, in favor of what he considered political honesty and judicial independence. In his course on that occasion he had coincided with—he could not say he had imitated, for he had not followed—that of an honorable gentleman whose talents formerly commanded respect, even in that House, and who more recently, during a very trying period, administered the government of the State in question. He would not attempt to speak of that gentleman as posterity would speak of him; but, he must be permitted to say, that he never could regret any act of his public life which was sanctioned by such illustrious authority.

Mr. W.'s conduct in relation to that question, however, was such as it was the pleasure of many of his constituents, for the present at least, to disapprove; and they had manifested their displeasure, as they had a right to do, by their votes. He would not pursue the subject further. He meant to give the House a clue to this matter; but he was not born to be his own historian, even if his history were as important as it certainly would be otherwise, and still less to pronounce anything that should look like eulogy or egotism.

It was very true, that distorted images of the act of last session, and the foulest and most malignant imputations on the motives of those who voted for and those who voted against it were there, as they were elsewhere, employed as the means of gratifying personal enmity and ill-judged ambition. But it was very far from being true, that these were the only means used; and it is certain that the success of these, so far as they were successful, was owing in a great degree to the indifference of those against whom they were directed. Their carelessness, their supineness, if described, might seem wonderful to such as lived only on the smiles of a Sovereign—a situation to which he would never suffer himself to be reduced, even though that Sovereign should be the people;—but it would not be in the least astonishing to others, who felt that honor is not derived from office or from power, but from the manner in which they are acquired and employed. What he had proposed to himself through life, was the pursuit of honorable ends by honorable means, and by no other means than such as were strictly honorable. Honest ambition, sir, said Mr. W., like the eagle, soars upward to the sky, gazing undazzled at the most glorious object, whilst political intrigue burrows downward in the earth, and, working crookedly in the dark,

"Toils much to earn a monumental pile,
"That may record the mischief it has done."

He had, therefore, never thought, and hoped he should never think, a seat on that floor so desirable; although he protested that, to his mind, not only was there no office on earth more desirable, but that no man on earth estimated it higher than he did; yet he never thought a seat so desirable as to be procured, at all events, by the means which might sometimes be necessary to obtain it. The noblest gift ought not to be held by the basest tenure; and whenever it became requisite for a Representative of the people, in order to secure a re-election, after passing five months of ceaseless occupation and discomfort; instead of returning to his domestic duties and enjoyments; to the care of his affairs, certainly not improved by his absence; to the society of his friends and to the study of that sound political philosophy which he is here called upon to practise;—whenever it became necessary, instead of doing this, to course through the country in pursuit of votes; to fawn and creep, and wriggle into favor, and to insure temporary caresses by deserving permanent contempt, he, for one, must be contented to forego them. He intended no disrespect for the people—far from it. All he meant to say was this, that whoever or whatever is sovereign in any country, will always find enough to flatter and corrupt; but for the same reason, that if he had the misfortune to be the subject of a monarchy, or the slave of a despotism, he would never minister to the vices or the follies of the king, or the emperor, or the autocrat,—for the same reason, as the citizen of a Republic, he would never be the sycophant of the people. Others, if they pleased, might sing to them the song which entices to destroy; others hold the cup that intoxicates to embrate.

In relation to a question which had been started, connected with this part of the subject, he concurred—he could do no more—with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who had uttered some sentiments worthy of the best men in the best times, of any country in the world: and he desired not to be considered as thus expressing himself for the first time in his life, and at a season when he had nothing to lose or to fear. Those who knew him, knew that such opinions had grown up with him from his boyhood, and become part of his character. He had had occasion to act upon them very recently more than once; and if they were political heresies, he was ready for their sake, to suffer any and every species of political martyrdom.

These notions he had freely and frequently avowed before the late election; they were contained in an answer which he had written to a corresponding committee, who did him the honor, pursuant to a meeting and some resolutions, to address a letter to him, not through the newspapers, or he certainly should not have replied to it, but through the post office, the object of which was to obtain certain pledges on the subject of the very law in question, which pledges he did himself the honor not to give. The committee had not seen fit to publish that answer, for which he was much obliged to them, since it was certainly a very indifferent composition.

For once, however, the meeting and the resolutions, and the correspondence, which, no doubt, like several others, were designed to be the stepping stone of many a gentleman's laudable ambition, did not answer the purpose—for he had understood that the county had not thought proper to elect to the State Senate one of the patriotic members of that committee, who was willing to have been so honored; and on the Congressional poll of that county, Mr. W. had been informed his own name stood either first or second, he did not recollect which.

Mr. W. begged pardon for the digression. He had wished to exhibit a trait—an honorable one, he thought it, in the character of the people whom he represented. He would dismiss the subject so far as it related to the election, which it had pleased gentlemen to allude to, by merely remarking, that though well assured of the event for some time previous, he had not deemed it advisable either to withdraw or to resign. He had preferred encountering his trial, performing his duty to the last, and then submitting to the sentence that was passed upon him. And he had preferred it on the same grounds that he would have preferred, could he have been worthy of the choice—the punishment of ostracism to voluntary banishment.

The misfortune of being removed from public employment, if, indeed, as his friend and colleague (Mr. FORSYTH) had remarked, it could be considered as a misfortune, was one which had no power over him.

He had felt and contemplated it until it was familiar; and he could not believe that any man was entirely prepared to commence life in the service of his country, who was not perfectly prepared to end it without a murmur, whenever, and in whatever way it might be necessary—possibly in exile, probably in disgrace, and certainly in obscurity.

Sir, said Mr. W., if any one were to propose an amendment to the Constitution, going to prohibit every man who was not possessed of property to the value of thirty or forty thousand dollars from holding a seat here, would it not be received with universal indignation in this House and out of it? Sir, it would; we all know it would. And yet, if we fix the remuneration of legislative services so low that none but men of fortune can afford to perform them, is it not precisely the same thing? What was the essential difference, he begged leave to ask, between saying in the Constitution, that no man who is not possessed of thirty thousand dollars, shall be a Representative—and saying, by law, that no Representative who has not thirty thousand dollars, or the income arising from thirty thousand dollars in his pocket, shall be able to continue in the service of the public? The one was a direct and positive—the other an indirect and virtual prohibition; but the effect of both was the same. It was to lessen the number of citizens among whom a choice could be made; it was to superadd another qualification, not heretofore known to our Constitution—the qualification of wealth. It was to say to the people “you shall not choose a poor man, or a man in moderate circumstances, to represent you;” and to say to such men, “Whatever may be your talents, or your virtues, you shall not come here—at least, you shall not stay here, without ruin to yourselves and to your families.” Mr. W. was not prepared to say that; and, least of all, was he prepared to say it by law. If we were to adopt a system of prohibitions to encourage the manufacture of such men into Representatives, and all kinds of prohibitions and manufactures seemed to be the favorites of the day—he did not say we were to do so—but if we were, if the Government was to hold out all the honors of the country as bounties to those citizens who could enrich themselves the fastest, no matter how, he was clearly of opinion that the bounty and the prohibition should be found in the Constitution, that all might see and understand it.

Had it originally been found there, it might have produced at least one good effect—he would never have had an opportunity of troubling the House on this or any other occasion, and many very good men among his constituents, who doubted whether he was quite rich enough to be worthy of a seat there, would never have suffered any such perplexity. But though in his own case a prohibition of that sort might have been beneficial, he was not inclined to infer it would, therefore, be beneficial in every other. In that respect, he argued somewhat differently from those who, finding prohibitions profitable to themselves, very rationally and naturally concluded that they must be profitable to everybody else. He did not think so. He thought he saw around him abundant proofs that such a system of exclusion would be very unprofitable to the American people. The direct tendency, nay the immediate effect, of not allowing a sufficient sum to the members of the legislative body, was to enforce such an exclusion. It was, in some degree, to make the possessors of wealth a privileged order; and he had, therefore, voted in Committee of the Whole for filling the first blank with ten dollars, with an understanding that the travelling expenses would remain at six. He had voted subsequently for nine, and for eight. He should do so again in the House. He would vote for any reasonable daily compensation which should commence with the next session; and if he could not obtain it otherwise, he should vote for it to commence with this; though for his own part he should prefer a settlement of the accounts of the present session upon such terms as would prove decisively the total absence of every selfish motive, and the complete indifference, he had nearly said contempt, with which gentlemen viewed the whole subject when regarded merely in the light of pecuniary interest.

He wished to see the present act repealed for the same reasons, and for no other reasons, (as his colleague had already said,) that he had originally voted against it. But he did not wish to see it repealed at the end of the session, and nothing substituted.

He had no desire to have this matter agitated again. It ought now to be settled on a permanent basis, at least as permanent as they could make it. And thus would have done everything in their power to effect this by fixing on a liberal sum to be paid in the old mode. There, probably, the succeeding Congress would be willing to let the matter rest; at least we should deprive them of one pretence for disturbing it; and, if any evil had been done by the passage of the last act, some good might thus be extracted from that evil. For himself, he had always acknowledged his conviction that the former compensation was inadequate, and he looked with fearful anxiety to the operation of any cause which would bring into that House two descriptions of men already often alluded to, the wealthy and ambitious intriguer, able to corrupt, and the needy and venal demagogue, willing to be corrupted. Of that House he feared it might be said in the words of Claudian—

“A fronte recedant imperii.”

Yes sir, they were receding, they had receded from the front of empire. That House, formerly the favorite of the American nation, the first and most important branch of the Government—the immediate image of the people—had been losing and continued to lose, certainly by no fault of theirs, but by the working of causes not for him to develop, that rank and power in the Republic originally belonging to them, and which others at their expense had been secretly acquiring. He would not say the degradation has been intentional or systematic. But he would say, that if the attempt which was now making proved successful—if the people were brought to join in the abasement of their Representatives and to direct their affection and confidence only to the Executive, this Government was no longer what those who made it intended it should be. You may call it what you please, but it is not necessary to tell you what it is.

Sir, said Mr. W., I did say this House was degraded. Look at the actual state of things for years past, do you not see that a seat in this House, the only office in the immediate gift of the people, employing and requiring the highest powers, the noblest faculties of man, is placed upon a level with, nay, it is placed below some thousand of mere ministerial offices in the gift of the Executive, which demand little more than common honesty and a knowledge of accounts? Had they not seen honorable gentlemen going out of that House to accept, not foreign missions, not seats in the Cabinet, or on the bench, not any of the high and responsible offices in the Government, not even to be accountants and auditors, and comptrollers, but to take clerkships, collectorships, postmasterships and Indian agencies? To become commissioners of loans, or collectors of the customs or of the direct tax, to be gaugers and tide waiters, and excisemen—scribes and publicans?

He meant no personal allusions, he spoke not of individuals, for about them he knew nothing, and cared nothing. Solitary cases were of no consequence as arguments, and it was only the general nature and extent of the evil that made it worth mentioning.

Mr. W. said he spoke not from guess, but from the information of official documents when he said that considerably upwards of five—nearly if not quite six thousand officers were employed by this Government, and of these at least one thousand to twelve hundred, how many more he would not pretend to say, received each in salary, pay, emoluments or compensation of one sort or other—he meant fairly and regularly—as much, and most of them more than the members of this House previous to the last session. What then was the fact? The President and Senate have in their gift a thousand or twelve hundred offices, each of which equals, and most of which very far exceeds in mere pecuniary value a seat in that House, the only office in the immediate gift of the people. What is the consequence? Why, certainly, that whenever the compensation of the legislative body was so low as to be barely adequate to the support of a gentleman, and entirely inadequate to the support of himself and family at the Seat of Government, the President and Senate would have it in their power, and one day or other might, he did not say they would, have it in their inclination, to acquire a sinister influence over the deliberations of the Representatives of the people; and the materials of which that House would be composed in such a state of things, must be just such as would be fittest for their purpose. Place it on the very best footing you can, say that, notwithstanding the insufficiency of the compensation, honest independent men in middling circumstances will come here from patriotism and the love of distinction. It is evident they cannot remain here long enough to acquire experience in public affairs without exhausting their private fortune. And when that is gone, whatever might be their original character, they will be driven by necessity to become dependants on Executive bounty, placemen, and pensioners and sinecurists. Your public offices will be converted into hospitals for decayed statesmen, the distribution of jobs and contracts among the members of both Houses will be connived at, everything will gradually become venal, and in the end your Constitution will be subverted.

Mr. W. begged leave to say a word about comparative compensation. He had made some notes and calculations on that point. He hoped the House would not be alarmed at their length, he had no intention of giving them anything like the trouble he had taken himself. He meant only to state a few striking facts. His comparison would not be of the emolument of a member of that House with those of any of the great officers; the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of the War, and Navy Departments; the foreign Ministers, Judges, and Attorney General—most of whom he apprehended were compelled to expend rather more than they received; nor even with those of the Comptrollers, Auditors, Registers, Treasurers, Accountants, Superintendents, and Commissioners; but with those of the yet more subordinates officers of the Government, whose existence—he spoke of them as officers, not as men—whose existence the great mass of the people of this country scarcely remembered. He begged permission to refer to a list of some of them.

For example, the collector of the direct tax for the second district of New York, received seven thousand eight hundred and ten dollars. For the first district in Pennsylvania, seven thousand three hundred and eighty-seven; for the fourth district in Maryland, six thousand four hundred and fifteen; for the eleventh district in Massachusetts, six thousand one hundred and ninety-one; for the sixth district in Pennsylvania, five thousand six hundred and ninety-four. From these sums, it was true, whatever was paid for clerk hire must be deducted; which unless, indeed, it was very great, would still leave no inconsiderable amount behind. He would mention some others, however, which he understood were not liable to any such drawback. Such as the collector of the port of Boston, five thousand; of New York five thousand; of Philadelphia, five thousand; of Norfolk, five thousand; of Savannah, five thousand; of New Orleans, five thousand; at Charleston and Baltimore he presumed they could not receive less, but of this he had no certain information. To these he might add the commissioner under the 4th article of the Treaty of Ghent, four thousand four hundred and forty-four; agent under the same, three thousand; commissioner under the 5th article, four thousand four hundred and forty-four; commissioner under the 6th and 7th articles, four thousand four hundred and forty-four; agent under the same, three thousand; naval officer of Boston, three thousand five hundred; of Philadelphia, three thousand five hundred; of Norfolk, three thousand five hundred; the naval officer at New York, it must be supposed receives the same; the surveyor of Boston, three thousand; of New York, three thousand; of Philadelphia, three thousand; of Norfolk, three thousand. The postmasters, at Albany, two thousand; at Baltimore, two thousand; at Boston, two thousand; at Charleston, South Carolina, two thousand nine hundred and eighty; at Hartford, Connecticut, two thousand two hundred and thirty-four; at New Orleans, two thousand one hundred and eighty; at Norfolk, two thousand and seven; at Petersburg, Virginia, two thousand six hundred and fifty-five; at Philadelphia, two thousand; at Pittsburg, two thousand one hundred and eighteen; at Providence, two thousand two hundred and nine; at Richmond, two thousand six hundred and forty-eight; at Savannah, two thousand two hundred and sixteen; at Washington City, five thousand two hundred and seven dollars.

Mr. W. did not wish to be understood as excepting to the salaries of these officers, or any of them. He had no doubt they thought them low enough, and he dared say they might very well deserve them; on that point he did not intend to express any opinion. They were all he presumed very respectable men, and to many among them, most probably, the country or the Government owed great obligations. Some few of them, however, unless his recollection deceived him, appeared to have no objection to pluralities.

Would any one, asked Mr. W., after running his eye over that list, pretend to compare those offices, either as to their importance or as to the abilities they required, with a seat on that floor and the qualifications of such a man as ought to fill it? Yet the average compensation of a member of that House, under the old law was about $1,140, and the average time of his absence from home about half the year. Why, according to that law, said Mr. W., you did not pay him for the time he was actually employed on the public business, at the same rate, per day, that you paid a naval officer or surveyor of the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Norfolk. But, then, there was the honor—true; and had the Senate and House of Representatives a monopoly of honors? Were there none out of the General Government? If honors were the objects of a gentlemen's pursuit, could he not find them more readily in the State governments than in that House? To many it was as much or more an object of ambition to be among the first men in a State, than among the second in the House of Representatives; it undoubtedly was easier and required fewer sacrifices. They might rest assured, therefore, that when gentlemen could certainly unite honor and profit at home, very few would come there to seek it at a certain loss of money, a very uncertain gain in reputation; and of those who did, most would be such as set no value on money, because they had too much of it; others he feared would come, but from very different motives, who would set no value on honor, for a very different reason.

As to the State Legislatures undertaking to instruct the Representatives of the people, it was, said Mr. W., a flagrant usurpation; they had no Constitutional authority to do anything of the kind; it was directly in the teeth of the whole theory of our Government. He could not permit himself to discuss so unfounded a pretension, and one which had already been so amply refuted. But he must be allowed to say that instructions on that subject, particularly, came with a very bad grace from State Legislatures who had once raised their own pay from fifty to one hundred per cent., and some of them more than once since the year 1789. If the very patriotic, and enlightened, and distinguished gentlemen, who are usually at the head of such affairs in those bodies, had allowed themselves to think, they must have perceived that if there was any propriety in admonishing us to refund and reform, there was a peculiar propriety in setting us the example.

Some such instructions, he had never seen them, had been moved he understood in the Legislature of the State to which he belonged. He said belonged, for, by making him in every respect what he was, she had acquired a kind of political property in him, and however she might exercise that ownership, no murmur would ever pass his lips. Some such instructions, he said, had been moved in the Legislature of that State; but he was proud to learn such counterfeits were not more countenanced there, than in Virginia. They had passed, current indeed, while they were new, with the House of Representatives, but the wash was worn off before they reached the Senate, and there the further circulation of the base metal was frustrated.

Mr. W. said he would touch on only one topic more, and that but slightly, because his colleague (Mr. FORSYTH) had already put it on the right footing.

Those who voted in the minority on the act of last session, had been blamed because they had not set themselves up for political Jansenists, Puritans or Pharisees, thanking God they were not as other men were. Because they had not attempted, by refusing the compensation which that act provided, to impute to the majority, who passed it, motives of corruption, in whose existence the minority themselves did not believe.

To be blamed for such conduct, was more grateful to his mind than to be praised for the reverse. In saying this, he protested against the supposition that he was saying anything which could be, in the slightest degree, unpleasant to an honorable gentleman whose absence and the cause of that absence had excited sentiments of regret and sympathy, equally creditable to him and to that House. For that gentleman he had never entertained any other sentiments than those of the highest respect and esteem, and however the expression of those sentiments might appear to others, he would not regard it as a mere parliamentary compliment.

But the conduct of that gentleman on the particular occasion alluded to, had, he always understood, been the result of the peculiar circumstances in which he found himself placed. His situation being dissimilar from that of others, he had acted differently, but as this difference of action had grown out of peculiarity of situation, there could be no more reason for making his conduct the standard by which that of others should be judged, than there was to make theirs the standard for the judgment of his. He presumed there was no such intention. He was glad to perceive by the signs of dissent exhibited that there was not. He did not think it became any one, except in a very peculiar situation indeed, to set up his private judgment in opposition to the laws of the country, fairly and constitutionally passed, with perfect integrity on the part of the majority who passed them; and such he looked upon the law in question. It would have been particularly indefinite and unjust in him to have done so, while feeling that the former compensation was entirely inadequate and believing that the one adopted, though objectionable on other accounts, was certainly not more than a reasonable indemnity for expenses incurred.

He had never regretted his conduct in relation to that question, and could he have foreseen everything that had since occurred, he would not have varied it one jot from what it was. So far from it, that, situated as he was, thinking as he did, and voting as he had uniformly voted, there was scarcely any mean and pitiful action which he would not as soon have committed, as not to have taken the compensation provided by that law.

And yet he believed he was as careless of money as any one who had as little of it as he had, or any one who professed more contempt for it than he did. What was paid him, or in what medium it was paid, had never been the subject of inquiry with him. He had never asked, and at this moment could not tell, what he had received at the last session, and a small balance had been brought him by his friend and colleague after he returned home. He took whatever was handed to him by the officer of that House, and if the sum was increased by a law for which he did not vote, he received it without scruple, as, if it had been diminished by a law for which he had not voted, he would have taken it without complaint. He unquestionably should not have gone home to his constituents to ask them to make good the difference. No. He might be covetous of honor, but he certainly was not covetous of gold. It should never be said with truth of him, that he was either "alieni appetens," or "sui profusus." In doing justice to himself and to those with whom he had acted, by saying what in his opinion the occasion required, Mr. W. had been careful not to allow himself the use of any expression impugning the motives or wounding the sensibility of others. Knowing his own intentions to be upright, he had charity enough to believe the intentions of others were as upright as his own; and he was mindful on this, as he hoped he should be on every occasion, of what he had learned very early from a great master of morality and skilful anatomist of the human heart—"that he who is corrupt, is already suspicious, and he who is suspicious will quickly become corrupt."

About four o'clock, the question on concurring with the Committee of the whole House in their amendment, to wit: filling the blank with six dollars, as the daily pay, was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 81, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bennett, Blount, Boss, Brooks, Bryan, Burwell, Cady, Caldwell, Cannon, Cilley, Comstock, Conner, Crawford, Darlington, Desha, Dickens, Edwards, Fletcher, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Hahn, Hale, Hammond, Hardin, Harrison, Hawes, Heister, Hendricks, Herbert, Hooks, Huger, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, King, Langdon, Lewis, Little, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, William Maclay, William P. Maclay, Mason, McCoy, Hugh Nelson, Thomas M. Nelson, Noyes, Ormsby, Parris, Peter, Piper, Pleasants, Roane, Root, Ross, Sharpe, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Taul, Taylor of New York, Telfair, Tyler, Vose, Wallace, Ward of New Jersey, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilkin, Williams, Willoughby, and William Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Adgate, Alexander, Ather-ton, Bateman, Baylies, Betts, Birdsall, Birdseye, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brown, Calhoun, Carr of Massachusetts, Champion, Chappell, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Condict, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hall, Henderson, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Irving of New York, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Law, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Marsh, McKee, McLean, Middleton, Miller, Mills, Milnor, Moffitt, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, Jeremiah Nelson, Newton, Pickens, Pickering, Pitkin, Powell, Randolph, Reed, Reynolds, Rice, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Shesley, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Taylor of South Carolina, Thomas, Townsend, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilde, Thos. Wilson, Woodward, Wright, Yancey, and Yates.

So the House disagreed to the report, leaving the amount to be filled by a future vote.

SATURDAY, January 18.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the District of Maine, praying that an act may be passed to prohibit the exportation for a limited time, of breadstuffs and other articles of food.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that an additional Judge may be appointed for the said Territory, to reside east of Pearl river.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LATTIMORE also presented another petition from the Legislature of the said Territory, praying that the title to lands in said Territory, arising under grants from the British authorities, may be extinguished.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who have been instructed to inquire into the propriety of allowing to the State of Georgia, fifteen per cent. of her quota of the direct tax of 1816, assumed by the State, made a report, which was read: when, Mr. L. reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the State of Georgia fifteen per cent. upon the quota of direct tax for the year 1816, assumed and paid by that State; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the redemption of the public debt.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the committee to which was committed, on the fifteenth instant, the bill from the Senate, "concerning the Attorney General of the United States," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to continue in force an act, entitled "An act relating to settlers on the lands of the United States," which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the location of the lands reserved by the first article of the treaty between the United States and the Creek nation, to certain chiefs and warriors of that nation.

Mr. SHARP submitted the following:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, That a joint committee of two from each House be appointed to allot to the standing committees of both Houses of Congress, and such select committees as are appointed at the commencement of each session of Congress on the President's Message, their rooms for the discharge of the public business.

The reason stated by the mover for this resolution was the impossibility, from the present arrangement and occupation of the committee rooms, of some committees acting on the business referred to them, &c.

The resolution was read by unanimous consent, the first, second, and third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the Clerk was directed to cause the warrant of concession granted by the Spanish Government, to Elisha Winter and Sons, to be translated into the English language, and to have the said translation printed.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House a Message from the President of the United States, transmitting an account of the contingent expenses of the Executive, for the year 1816; which was laid on the table.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting the report of the commissioners for ascertaining and adjusting claims to land in the eastern district of the State of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "directing the discharge of John Ricaud, from imprisonment, were read and concurred in by the House.

PETITION OF A. McCORMICK.

Mr. YANOEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Alexander McCormick, which was read and referred to the Committee of the whole House, on the report of the same Committee on the petition of Renner and Heath.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioner resides in the City of Washington, and at this time, and for several years past, has kept a retail store. At the time the British forces invaded the city, (on the 24th August, 1814,) the petitioner was a lieutenant in the artillery company of militia, commanded by Captain Benjamin Burch, and then in service. On the evening of the 24th, about eight or nine o'clock, a party of British soldiers, in company with an officer, broke and entered the house of the petitioner, and took from his store a large quantity of merchandise, stated to be of the value of eight or ten thousand dollars.

It appears by the affidavit of Captain Carter, of the Maryland militia, that on the night of the 23d he and his company lodged at the house of Mr. McCormick, and that they also halted at his house on their retreat on the 24th. The petitioner requests of Congress to pay him the value of his property plundered by the British soldiery.

The committee are of opinion that this is a common case of the wanton sacrifice and plunder of private property by the British forces during the late war. The circumstance of the claimant being in the military service of the country at the time did not change the character of his property, nor did it authorize its capture or destruction. Like the private property of every other citizen, it was entitled to protection, though it shared the same fate as the property of many others.

The committee recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

THE COMPENSATION BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to repeal the act of last session, commonly called the compensation law. The bill having, by the vote yesterday, been left blank as to the per diem allowance for attendance and for each day's travelling—

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to fill the first blank with the sum of ten dollars, but spoke briefly against the necessity of allowing the same sum for each twenty miles' travelling, for which he thought the former sum of six dollars sufficient.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, that the refusal of the House, last evening, to concur with the report made by the Committee of the Whole, would induce him to break through the silence he had intended to observe on this question. He had always intended to vote in favor of repealing the law of the last session, which changed the mode and increased the amount of compensation to members of Congress; that he was in favor of restoring the original law, which granted a per diem allowance of six dollars; and that so long as the House appeared likely to carry his object into effect, he had not considered it his duty to address the Chair. But having seen, with no little surprise, that the House had reversed the decision of the Committee of the Whole, which fixed the future compensation of members at six dollars a day, he should hope to be indulged, while he offered such reasons as had occurred to him in favor of repealing the law of the last session, and against the motion made by the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) to fill the blank with ten dollars. It was not his intention now to propose a different sum; he would give the House an opportunity to express themselves distinctly on the motion of the gentleman from New York; and afterwards, if not moved by some other gentleman, he would himself propose to fill the blank with six dollars.

This subject, said Mr. W., has already undergone an ample discussion; and, in reference to that fact alone, I might well abstain from any share in the debate. But the subject has assumed such an aspect of importance in the country; there is such a conflict of sentiment about it, that it becomes every gentleman to state distinctly the views by which he has been governed, as well as those by which he is at present actuated. I had no idea, at the last session, that this subject would excite such lively feelings throughout the whole country. From Maine to Georgia, (as we were told by the Speaker,) from the Atlantic to the remotest settlement of the interior, there appears to have been an universal and simultaneous burst against it. I had, for the reasons which induced me to vote against it at the last session, supposed it might have been productive of some uneasiness in the public mind, but that it would raise a storm, which should shake the deepest foundations of popularity, and prostrate characters the most distinguished for long and faithful services, appeared to me scarcely possible, much less probable. Could such an event have been foreseen, he should have offered, at the last session, the reasons for the vote he then gave, although his acquaintance in the House, and the ample discussion the subject had undergone at that time, might, perhaps, have rendered a different course necessary.

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

The reasons, Mr. W. said, which had induced him to vote against the compensation law at the last session, would now induce him to vote in favor of its repeal. The mode of compensation had always appeared to him a very forcible objection. On this part of the subject, arguments had been offered, which were both explicit and convincing. It had been stated, that the mode is a departure from the long established practice of Congress; that it is a departure not only from the practice of Congress, but from the invariable usage of the Legislatures of the several States. In this reasoning he had fully concurred with gentlemen. He had thought the mode to be unprecedented; he had thought it to be impolitic; for it appears to have been the policy of the founders of the General and State Governments, to proportion the compensation to the services performed by their officers and agents. Where the quantum or amount of service was known, they attached a salary; where the quantum or amount of service was unknown, they granted a per diem allowance. A judge, for example, has certain duties to perform; he has so many courts to attend, and in these, generally speaking, there will be so many causes to try. The President of the United States has duties to perform every day; so has the Governor of a particular State. The amount of service performed by these officers will, on an average, be the same every year, and being known, they, therefore, have salaries. It may be said, that a judge has a fixed compensation to secure independence in the discharge of his official duties. I grant you, sir, this may have been one chief reason for fixing his salary. But independently of this reason, setting aside the numberless blessings which always have resulted, and ever will result, to society, from a virtuous judiciary, there appears, in the certainty of the amount of service performed by a judge, a sufficient reason to fix his compensation. But this is not the case in regard to the Legislature. There the business is undefined in nature and extent. Sometimes much business, of great importance, is to be transacted; at other times little business, and that of inferior moment, will come before them. During the last Congressional year, for example, the labor performed was better worth fifteen hundred dollars than that of the present year will be worth one thousand dollars. The quantum of labor performed by Congress being therefore unknown, it appeared unwise that members should receive a salary, because that would be attaching certain and fixed compensation to services uncertain and undefined in their amount. These are briefly my reasons for opposing the mode of compensation adopted at the last session.

An objection to the measure itself arose from the time at which it was adopted. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) very properly remarked, when he introduced this subject, that at the last session the taxes were considerably lessened. Yes, sir, the taxes were greatly reduced at the last session. The direct tax was reduced to one half; the tax on manufactures wholly removed; the still tax, and that on retailers, considerably lessened; and no doubt, when the people reflect on the subject, they will give Congress all due praise for those measures of reduction. But the taxes on the people appeared still too great, and their embarrassments too perplexing, for Congress to hazard the experiment of increasing their own pay. Had the people been free from all impositions of the kind, they would not have received this measure so ungraciously. The people, sir, are liberal. They would never object against allowing their Representatives adequate compensation. But while, as a consequence of the war, the people were obliged to sustain taxes and privations in any degree, it did appear more correct that Congress should also bear the privation and loss incident to them. If the law of the last session had been blameless in all other respects, it would have been a sufficient objection that the people were, at that time, taxed. That they yet felt the consequences of the late war.

It also appeared indelicate that we should increase our own pay. Upon this point I know there has been much misrepresentation in the newspapers and elsewhere, and it is greatly to be lamented that newspapers have such control over the opinions of the country, unless they were vehicles of more correct information. The present Congress have been charged with violating the Constitution, which they had sworn to preserve; clauses, sections, and articles of the Constitution have been adduced to prove the charge. A belief that it is true, has been disseminated through some portions of the country, and no doubt has very much tended to increase the displeasure of the people. But upon examining authentic copies of the Constitution, it will be seen that the charge is utterly unfounded; that no part of the instrument contains the prohibition to which reference has been made. It must then be admitted, that it was not a question of Constitutionality, but merely a question of delicacy, which every member was at liberty to determine for himself. For my own part, I could not support a measure, of which I was to be the immediate beneficiary. It is a duty which every one owes to himself, to act in such a manner as to be free from all imputation, to bid defiance to the assaults of malevolence, however dark, or of asperity the most pungent. In the observance of this rule, it became my duty to oppose the law of the last session. It now also becomes my duty to advocate its repeal.

There had been many objections, said Mr. W., against the amount of compensation allowed by law. He was aware, he said, that this could not be ascertained by any known rule, as the amount per day would depend altogether upon the length of the session. Sometimes it would be more and sometimes less. The situation of the country might be such as to protract the session to six, eight, or ten months. In this case, the amount per day would be much less than when Congress should remain in session only three or four months. It would, therefore, be incorrect to say, that the compensation amounted to any precise sum per day; or that this sum was greatly beyond the expenses necessarily incurred at the Seat of Government. It might so happen that members, during a session of great length, would be brought in debt; and, on the other hand, that, during a very short session they would receive for their services a much larger amount than six dollars a day. The amount per day, as before stated, would altogether depend on the length of the session, and in this consisted another reason for preferring the daily allowance made by the original law. For myself, I found that I could live decently on the former compensation of six dollars. Other gentlemen necessarily and unavoidably incurred much greater expense, and to them no doubt the six dollars a day might have been insufficient. In deciding this question, however, I would be supposed to have reference only to that portion of expense necessarily incurred by myself, and finding the six dollars a day sufficient to defray my own expenses, it could not be expected that I would, under these circumstances, vote for the measure. It was impossible for me to tell what portion of expense beyond the six dollars a day incurred by other gentlemen, could not have been avoided by them; and it will never be pretended that Congress should provide by law for all the expenses of members, however avoidable or unnecessary they might be. I make the declaration and appeal to the candor of the House to sustain me in the truth of it, that the former compensation was, generally, enough to defray the expenses of gentlemen. But I do not pretend to assert, at the same time, that any one could make money by coming to Congress at six dollars a day; nor do I believe it was ever intended that a seat in this House should be regarded as a money-making business. If we are to hold out pecuniary inducements to men of the first talents, we should not stop at six dollars a day, at fifteen hundred a year, or at twenty thousand a year, because many men who have thought themselves honored by a seat in this House, make from five thousand to twenty-five thousand dollars a year by their professional pursuits. To proceed, then, on the ground of pecuniary inducement, would be impracticable. It would defeat the object of our Republican institutions, viz: economy through every branch of their administration. But, to regard a seat in this House as an honorable employment, attended with such pecuniary benefit as would indemnify us for all expenses necessarily incurred, appears more consistent with the character and design of our Government. For that purpose, I found the former compensation of six dollars a day quite sufficient. If other gentlemen found it insufficient for themselves, they, no doubt, voted conscientiously for the law of the last session. With the motives of gentlemen I have nothing to do, but trust always to feel great respect for them, even in cases where we differ.

The charge which has been made by demagogues, by those who are interested in deceiving the people, that Congress, by this law, committed something like an act of speculation, is utterly unfounded and unbecoming. It is much to be regretted that this measure has given rise to the most unworthy suspicions and unfounded accusations against Congress. It can never be asserted with truth that the measure was unconstitutional, or that it was adopted with any improper design of personal benefit. Even those who clamor most against this law, the greedy expectants of future promotion, must believe that the measure was adopted, on the part of those who supported it, with precisely the same views and motives which govern them in the adoption of every other measure; that is, they believed it would be useful to the country. I, sir, am willing to say and to testify by my vote now, as I did at the last session, that, in this as well as in many other measures, the Representatives mistook the interest and wishes of their constituents. But that they were actuated by a spirit of hostility to either, cannot be believed by any one.

The reasons already assigned with as much brevity as possible, induced me to vote against the compensation law at the last session. But I have now an additional reason, stronger than any yet offered, to vote in favor of its repeal. I mean the general voice of the country against it. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) took occasion to observe on yesterday that he felt himself under no obligation to obey the will of his constituents. Against this doctrine, sir, I beg leave to enter my decided protest. I wish it to be as distinctly understood, that I should feel obliged, by the instructions of my constituents, as the gentleman did, that he would not feel himself obliged. It is indifferent to me in what way the will of the people is made known, provided it be deliberately and gravely expressed. If thus expressed, I hold it binding. For, sir, the people are the sovereign power in this country. Hence, I lay down the broad principle, that they must be right; in other words, that they can do nothing wrong, and ought to be obeyed. Whenever the sovereign power is lodged in any Government, there must be at least theoretical infallibility. In monarchy, the sovereign power is lodged in a single individual, and hence it is common to say that the King (as in England) can do no wrong. Now, sir, although this may be incorrect or absurd in regard to the practice of England, yet it is theoretically right. The idea may be illustrated in this way: It will, I presume, be granted that a power which can do no wrong, ought to be obeyed at all times. But the sovereign power must be obeyed at all times. Therefore, the sovereign power can do no wrong. If this be true in regard to monarchy, it is much more true in regard to our own Government. There the sovereign has not only all the infallibility assigned to him in theory, but likewise all the reality of physical force. If the sovereign of England should do wrong in practice, as has often occurred, and will frequently occur again, the people, in whom the physical strength resides, oppose him, and in this way obtain redress. But, in our Government, the case is widely different. Here, the supposed infallibility of a sovereign, and the real physical strength, both reside in the people. And if the people should perchance do wrong, how is that wrong to be corrected? The people cannot resist themselves; and if they should even do wrong in practice, there is no power on earth to oppose them. If, in England, the sovereign must be obeyed, because he can do no wrong in theory, it appears to me that, in our own Government, the sovereign must be obeyed, because he can do no wrong in theory or practice; and that is the difference between a Republic, constituted like ours, and a monarchy. That the people are the sovereign power in this country, gentlemen have not pretended, nor will they dare, to deny. This principle is consecrated as the basis of all our political institutions, and long may the people continue to exercise the power which they have thus solemnly guaranteed to themselves. Shall I not, then, cheerfully yield obedience to their voice, and say this law ought to be repealed? Yes, sir, it would be my duty, even if I had previously been in favor of the law; but, as I was opposed to it at the last session, I should now, if it were only in regard to consistency, be for repealing it. But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) will object to this reasoning, because it involves the admission of a right in the constituent to instruct his Representative. Most certainly it does, and for that I contend. We, sir, are no more authorized by the Constitution to suppose the people destitute of intelligence and virtue, than to suppose them destitute of physical strength. The Constitution attaches to them power, wisdom, and goodness, as their attributes of sovereignty. The will of the sovereign, invested with these attributes, must be obeyed, as well from the necessity as the reasonableness of the thing.

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

It has been urged, on the other hand, that the people are not always sufficiently advised of the circumstances attending a measure, to pronounce upon the policy of its adoption, and that, to practice upon the presumption that they were sufficiently advised, would lead to fatal consequences. But I think differently. The people cannot, and never will, speak in a voice audible or directory to their Representatives, unless they are duly ap-prized of the various connexions and tendencies of any given measure. I, sir, no more than the gentleman from South Carolina, would have a Representative surrender his judgment in obedience to mere passion or caprice. But if the Representative has no rational doubt that the people, in all their integrity of heart, and with all the means of judgment before them, would decidedly object to a measure, or firmly wish its adoption, then I hold that their will should be obligatory upon him. He should not set at defiance their instructions. He should consider that, if the people are sufficiently informed to make a wise election, they ought to be sufficiently informed to give wise instructions; that, if a supposed want of information would disqualify them from doing the former, the same want of information ought to have disqualified them from doing the latter. Such reasoning would at once strike at the wisdom and policy of the Constitution, and therefore must be erroneous.

If it be true, in regard to measures generally, that a Representative should be bound to act according to the deliberate will of his constituents, it is particularly so in regard to the measure now before the House. On the subject of compensation to ourselves, motives of mere delicacy should induce us to comply with the will of the people. They have pronounced, in language not to be misunderstood, that the law of the last session was wrong. If they have spoken thus, it is our duty to repeal it. But gentlemen contend that we hear nothing but the voice of faction; that, if the law is condemned, it is chiefly by those who do not understand it. Sir, we do not hear the voice of faction alone on this subject; neither are the people ignorant of the law. If they have not realized the force of arguments offered in support of the measure, it is because the arguments have not corresponded with facts. The chief argument was, that the pay of members had become less valuable by depreciation; and that, in consequence thereof, the talents of this House had depreciated. But, does this argument agree with the fact? I pretend not to have an opinion of my own on this point. My situation has not been such as to enable me to judge. But other gentlemen, of high character and long standing in this House, say that the present Congress will not suffer by comparison with any that has preceded it. Instead, then, of the talent of the House depreciating, as the pay depreciated, the fact is otherwise. The argument, therefore, does not agree with the fact, and this may be assigned as the reason that the people have not assented to the measure. Convince the people that this law is now expedient, on the ground which has been urged; satisfy them it is necessary to command the best talents of the nation, and you will not hear a syllable against it. They know too well the value of self-government to be unwilling to pay the expense of any measure calculated for their good. But so long as the necessity is not apparent, so long as our first men for talents and information occupy seats on this floor, at six dollars a day, we cannot be surprised that the people have been unwilling to sanction the measure. Viewing it in all the lights in which it has been presented, I think it ought to be totally repealed. For that purpose, I hope the motion made by the gentleman from New York, to fill the blank with ten dollars, will not prevail, but that it will be filled with six dollars, by which the original law will, in effect, be restored.

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, said that he felt it due to himself to offer a few remarks to the House on this subject. He did not, he said, float into that House on the tide of popular declamation. He had been elected to supply a vacancy occasioned by the lamented death of his honored predecessor. Popularity, he said, was to be desired by all. The good esteem of his fellow-men is the best reward the patriot can receive. You have no robes of office here to bestow—no star or garter to confer; but the proudest title of which we can boast, and the only one worthy of being boasted of, is that which is to be read in the applause of our contemporaries, and the gratitude of posterity. This applause was not to be obtained, he said, by a low, grovelling, mean pursuit of popular favor. No, sir, the man who rests his hopes of popularity upon such a course, will, most assuredly, be disappointed in his object. Popularity might, he had always thought, be aptly compared to a coquette; the more you woo her, the more apt is she to elude your embrace. It is by pursuing a steady, firm, and uniform course, not at variance with the rights of the people, that she is made to yield to your embrace.

He said that the applause of which he had been speaking, was not either to be obtained by the adoption of that high-toned principle, which caused a man, the moment he became a member of this House, to set up his opinion in opposition to the opinions of thirty-five thousand of his constituents; to adopt the belief that they might err, but that he could not. Mr. T. inquired, who was the member of this House that would undertake to set up his opinion in opposition to that of his constituents? If a member of this House was not a Representative of the people, what was he? And if he was, how could he be regarded as representing the people when he spoke not their language, but his own? He ceased to be a Representative of the people when he did so, and represented himself alone. Was the creature to set himself up in opposition to his creator? Was the servant to disobey the wishes of the master? Mr. T. said, from the very meaning of the word representative, the obligation to obey instructions resulted. The Federal Constitution had been submitted to conventions of the different States for adoption. Suppose the people had instructed their Representatives in convention to have rejected the Constitution, and their instructions had been disobeyed, would this, he asked, be called a Government of the people, adopted by their choice? The gentleman from South Carolina had not denied the right of instruction in the formation of the Government. Was there any difference in principle between that case and the case of instructions to this House? The members of the Convention were the representatives of the people in the organization of the Government; we are the Representatives of the people in the administration of that Government. Why, Mr. T. asked, was responsibility to the people preserved? If the opinion of a member of this House is to be regarded as more correct, if he is to be esteemed more wise than they are, why should he be responsible to his constituents for his conduct? It is the height of absurdity to say that a man shall owe responsibility to a tribunal not so capable of deciding between right and wrong as the individual himself.

Mr. T. acknowledged that if instructions went to violate the Constitution, they were not binding. And why, he asked? My constituents, said he, have no right to violate the Constitution themselves; they had, then, no right to require of him to do that which they themselves had no right to do. He regarded it, therefore, as only necessary that he should know the wishes of his constituents, in order that he should obey them.

In his support of the doctrine for which he had been contending, he was not to be understood as speaking of a mere buzz or popular clamor. He would be as little disposed to attend to anything of that sort as any gentleman; but he spoke of the voice of the majority of the people, distinctly ascertained. The gentleman from South Carolina had mentioned the name of Edmund Burke; he had properly been called by a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONNER) the pensioned Burke. He venerated the talents of that distinguished orator as highly as any man. He held also in high respect the memory, and talents, and virtues of the immortal Chatham; but, highly as he esteemed the memories of those illustrious statesmen, Mr. T. said that they would suffer no disparagement by a comparison with the immortal Sidney. Mr. T. preferred to draw his principles from the father of the church—from the man who had fallen a martyr in the cause of freedom—who had consecrated his principles by his blood—from the fountain from which has flowed the very principles of the very Constitution under which we act.

Mr. T. said that he should vote for a repeal of the compensation law. He knew it to be the wish of his constituents that it should be repealed. He said that he had had a fair opportunity of knowing their wishes; that he was fresh from their hands. He was not disposed to hold up his constituents in the ridiculous light in which some gentlemen had represented theirs. He said he had too much respect for them to do so. His constituents had looked to the large national debt—they thought it required reduction—that economy was necessary. They saw the tax-gatherers dispersed through the country. They could not be made to understand why, at a time that retrenchment was necessary, Congress should have increased their wages. It was, said Mr. T., vain to tell them, as some gentlemen who had been very nice at calculation had made it appear, that each of them had only to bear an additional burden of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents. The answer was at hand: They said, and had a right to say to you, take the pressure from off our shoulders, we feel the weight of it; take the burden from off our backs, then take it from off your own backs. Sir, said Mr. T., they went further. Although they did not believe that this Congress was corrupt, they regarded you as setting a bad example. They looked forward, said he, to distant and more corrupt times, when wicked men, profiting by this example, might vote themselves ample fortunes, and then laugh at the people. I repeat, said Mr. T., that my constituents did not think this body corrupt for having passed this law. They looked here, he said, and saw men who had devoted their youth to the service of their country, and who had grown old at the helm of the vessel. They saw among you many who had rode out in security the boisterous storm of faction and of party, and had avoided the whirlpools that had threatened to swallow up you and them. They looked to the field, and saw many of you with your breasts exposed to receive the lightning ere it fell on the bosom of your country.

My constituents, I repeat it, sir, did not distrust your patriotism, but they strongly disapproved your course. It was not for him to inquire into the correctness of their opinions; it was enough for him that he knew their will, to cause him to obey it. Mr. T. declared that he would vote for a repeal of the law, to take effect from the first of the session, and that he hoped it would pass in that form.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, apologized to the House for rising at so late an hour. [It was past 4 o'clock.] He said he had abandoned his intention to address the House upon the question before them, and he should not have resumed it for the mere purpose of discussing the merits of the bill of last session, now proposed to be repealed. The merits of that measure appeared to him to have been ably and amply examined. Several gentlemen had triumphantly vindicated the law. Among them, Mr. G. said, he had heard with peculiar satisfaction the able, manly, and Constitutional speech of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) [Mr. G. paused a moment, when he proceeded.] Mr. Speaker, I will not be restrained, no barriers shall exist which I will not leap over for the purpose of offering to that gentleman my thanks for the judicious, independent, and national course, which he has pursued in this House for the last two years, and particularly upon the subject now before us. Let the honorable gentleman continue with the same manly independence, aloof from party views, and local prejudices, to pursue the great interests of his country—and fulfil the high destiny for which it is manifest he was born. The buzz of popular applause may not cheer him on his way, but he will inevitably arrive at a high and happy elevation in the view of his country and the world; and to those who surrender their conscience, their judgment, and their independence, at the shrine of popular caprice and clamor, he shall finally hold the same relation, that the eagle in his towering flight holds to the grovelling buzzard. No gentleman had been bold enough to encounter his argument of yesterday. No gentleman could encounter it without a sure prospect of discomfiture.

It is unnecessary to add, said Mr. G., that I agree with that gentleman in all his views of the propriety, importance, and necessity of the bill of last session.

It is perfectly notorious, hardly a gentleman, be he for or against that bill, has denied that an increased pay to the members of Congress was essential to their comfort and support. By the depreciation of the coin, the old per diem pay had sunk to half its original value—and the bill of last session did not restore the present members to an equality of compensation, with those who were here in the first years of our Constitution. Nor can any gentleman who has experienced the expenses of a temporary residence at the Capital, pretend for a moment, that the compensation of last session is a lavish allowance, for services of gentlemen, under circumstances like those which surround the members of this House.

But, Mr. Speaker, this view of the subject sinks into insignificance, when compared with another, first exhibited by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) and enforced by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The purity, dignity, and independence of this House, the interest and safety of the people, the durability and spirit of the Government, all demanded an increased compensation.

Talents, integrity, and political experience, can be kept on this floor only by something like a remuneration for the services of those who possess them. Not, Mr. Speaker, a full remuneration; but such a reward as will enable the possessors of them, without becoming "worse than infidels," to devote them to the good of the country.

Is it not important to the existence of the Government, to the safety of the people, that talents, integrity, independence, and political experience, should be placed and continued here? Look at the power and patronage of the Executive. Armies, navies, revenues, with all their hosts of dependants, with the whole civil list of officers and salaries! With these mighty instruments of influence and power, the Executive pervades and influences the whole Republic. And the eyes of every ambitious and aspiring man must be elevated above this House, to Executive favor, as the object of all his hopes and all his exertions.

Well have gentlemen said, that to resist and render harmless this flood of patronage and influence, the people can look only to this House. It is through this House the Treasury must be watched and protected from abuse. By this House only can the people exercise the power of impeachment. Through it only can the minions of patronage, the instruments of oppression, be seized and dragged to the public tribunal, and punished for their offences. And here, too, and here only, can the great source of all power and patronage, the Executive himself, be arraigned and punished for abuses of his power, for injuries to the people.

Can it then be wise to degrade this House? Can it be safe for the people to shatter in pieces their own shield and buckler? To wither the arm that, in their cause and their defence, must wield the sword of justice and of punishment?

Can it be for their safety to place the compensation of the members on a footing, which will render this House a receptacle for the rich and the powerful on the one hand, and the unprincipled hunters after Executive favors on the other; and infallibly exclude from its walls all in those middle walks of life, where, in this country, talents, knowledge, and political experience, though not exclusively, are most generally found?

What must finally result from such a policy? Why, sir, this House will become, as the Commons of England, a mere step in the ladder of ambition—a barren bough, on which the birds of foul omen will rest for a moment, only to take a new flight to the higher regions of office and patronage; while those who shall remain will constitute a mass of inert matter, receiving motion and direction from the hand which the Executive shall set apart to manage it.

And then, instead of constituting, as was originally intended, a mound against the flood of patronage constantly flowing into the great Executive reservoir, it will itself plunge into the stream; and aid to swell and give force and violence to the current, which will sweep away the liberties of the people. Sir, upon a question involving, as in my conscience I believe this does, such consequences, I will not descend to the calculations of shillings and pence. Every dollar, within reasonable reward and compass, bestowed on the members of this House by the people, will add only to the patronage of the people. It will render less attractive the glittering baubles in the hands of the Executive; and by increasing the dignity, independence, and strength of this House, will render it forever inaccessible to the sappings and minings of Executive patronage, and to the open assaults of Executive power.

I have heard it objected, that, if the compensation for services here be increased, men will seek a seat in the House, merely from a base love of the emolument. Sir, it is a vulgar and gross error, to suppose that men in general seek for high office and political power from any sort of regard to the pitiful pecuniary rewards with which it is attended. This is the passion of underlings only, of the base and grovelling spirits who are without any real love of fame or glory, and this is the imputation which they justly seek to fasten on each other. But it never can attach to the genuine statesman of our Republic, nor to any who aspire to be ranked among its statesmen.

If the compensation to members be placed on an honorable and competent footing, the doors of this House are opened to such honorable and aspiring citizens; and the men of base and grovelling spirit, who seek a seat here for the paltry pittance of emolument by which it is attended, will stand no chance in the competition. No, Mr. Speaker, the objection is not substantial; it re-coils upon the objector. It is only by reducing the reward for service so low, as to leave men of character, and honor, and independence, and science, no decent support at the Capitol, that you can close the doors of this House upon them. Such men are then driven from the political field, and the purse-proud nabobs on the one hand, and the ignorant noisy fawning sycophants of power on the other, for whose talents and services the lowest compensation may be a high remuneration, will pour into this House without check or competition.

Another objection has been repeatedly advanced. Increase of compensation tends, it is said, to render the Representative independent of the people and unfaithful to their interests. This objection supposes, in him who makes it, a total ignorance of the theory of our Government. Is not every member periodically reduced to a level with the people? And can he again rise but by the will of the people? This is his dependence; and whether he receives six, or sixteen dollars per day, it can have no conceivable influence upon that dependence. He holds his seat by the tenure of good behaviour. And singular indeed is the notion, that, in proportion as you increase his pay and render his seat valuable, he will find inducements to neglect his duty and insure its forfeiture.

But Mr. G. said the merits of the bill had been amply discussed by others. He would pursue that topic no farther.

He had risen almost entirely to examine another doctrine, which had become essentially connected with the subject; a doctrine which, if it were sound and Constitutional, would indeed render all arguments upon the main question worse than useless. It had been distinctly announced by several gentlemen in the course of the debate, who had voted for the law of the last session, that, although their minds remained unchanged as to the justice and policy of the law, they should now vote for the repeal, because they were instructed to do so by their constituents.

Others had declared, that they considered the voice of the people against the law, and this they considered as tantamount to a command or instruction, which they were bound to obey, without considering the reasonableness, justice, or policy of that command or instruction.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) who had just taken his seat, has not hesitated to repeat this doctrine in the broadest terms, and to press it earnestly upon the House.

This position is, that the people, in districts, in States, and throughout the Union, have distinctly decided the question, have commanded the repeal, and we are bound, by our Constitution and the nature of Government, to obey their commands.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman be correct, if the fact and the law be indeed as he stated, what a spectacle of singular folly has this House exhibited during the whole week. We have been gravely discussing the merits of a measure already decided by the Constitutional and competent authority. Nay, the honorable gentleman himself, in the speech which he has just closed, has pressed his full share of this incongruous spectacle.

Has he not pressed upon us the propriety of the repeal of the law on its own demerits? How does he reconcile that with this doctrine, which leaves us no right to examine its merits? He first pressed upon us a doctrine which deprives us of all volition or free agency, and then spent a full hour in inquiry with us as beings having a right to volition and free agency in favor of the repeal.

Mr. Speaker, I deny, I wholly deny, that in the nature of a representative Government, in the spirit of our system, or in our Constitution, one principle, reason, or provision can be found, on which this doctrine of the right to instruct in the people, and the obligation of such instruction on the Representative, can rest for a moment. It matters not to me what form of instructions gentlemen may designate; whether in writing or by parol; whether by the people of districts, of States, or of the whole nation. They have no Constitutional power to fetter the free will of the Representative, or to control his judgment, his conscience, or his independence, in any the highest or the lowest act of legislation.

If such a right exists in the people, and such an obligation on the Representative, they must be somewhere defined. And where would gentlemen search for them? Surely not in the visions of cosmopolites, not in the licentious fictions of the French revolutionary school, nor in the written and unwritten creeds of jacobins and despots throughout the world. The statesmen of our Revolution trusted their rights to no such perishable and undefined securities. No, sir, we must find them in that instrument where the nature of our whole system of Government is delineated; where the liberties of the people, the powers, prerogatives, and duties of every department of our Government are granted, defined, and secured; in the Constitution and in no other instrument under Heaven. Let gentlemen then turn with me to the Constitution. The analysis shall be short to demonstrate, not only that in all its sections not a trace of this doctrine of instruction can be found, but, also, that it is wholly opposed to the fundamental principles of the Government therein delineated.

The people were the sovereign of this country. From them emanated all the powers of Government. This is now the settled doctrine of the civilized world, and he must be a madman or an idiot in this Republic who would dispute it.

The sovereign people met in convention to organize a Government which should secure the rights and prosperity of the whole. What was the frame and nature of the Government which they formed? I enter not into the detail of its new and complicated machinery. I speak of its general divisions, its broad and essential features. They surrendered to, and divided among, certain officers, created by themselves, certain portions of their sovereign power. And this is the language in which they expressed that grant and that division:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such other inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time establish."

"Legislative power" is the power to make laws—"judicial power" is the power to construe and interpret those laws—and "executive power" is the power to execute them.

Here then, Mr. Speaker, is the sovereign, legitimate "voice" of the people—here the great and obligatory instructions which, and which alone, the officers of this Republic are bound to obey. The members of this House and the Senate are "instructed" to make the laws; the judges are "instructed" to interpret, and the President to execute them. Does not the power of legislation imply, of necessity, volition, free agency—the right to make the law, or not to make it, as the legislator shall deem expedient?

Shall I be told that the legislative power is vested in a body, which, in every act of legislation, is legally subject to be arrested, defeated, controlled, and absolutely governed by another, a distinct and a paramount Constitutional power? As well may gentlemen tell me that the power over life and death is vested in the gallows and guillotine, and not in the judge and executioner; as well may they tell me that the power of legislation is vested in the Speaker of this House, or the President of the Senate, because their signatures, made under the entire control of Congress, are requisite to give validity to every law. No, if this doctrine be true, then is the Constitution a felo de se. For it has granted a power, and rendered it idle and nugatory, by reserving a right absolutely and essentially repugnant to the grant; it has vested in Congress an absolute power, which essentially continues to reside in the people, by them to be exercised through the medium of "instructions," and Congress becomes in every act of legislation, instead of a legislative body, a mere passive instrument, like the clerk who engrosses the bill, or the pen and parchment with which it is recorded.

Sir, this reasoning applies with equal force to every department of our Government—to the Judicial and Executive equally with the Legislative; and the conclusion is irresistible, that not only is the Legislature, but the Judicial and Executive power are, at this moment, in the hands of the people. If the people have indeed reserved to themselves a power, rendering thus nugatory and wholly insufficient the powers they have expressly granted, that reservation must, by every rule of fair construction, be expressed and not implied. In what page of the Constitution does the gentleman find any such reservation? From what article or section will he read me anything like a right reserved to the people, either directly or indirectly, to legislate, to judge, or to execute? If there be any such, let it be distinctly brought to the eye of the House. There is none to be found. It would have stained its fair pages, for it would have attempted an absurdity, to grant and retain by the same instrument the same power and authority to secure a right in the nature of things incapable of execution.

But if no such right was reserved; if, by the Constitution, the whole power of legislating, judging, and executing was granted, will gentlemen say that the people have revoked the grant? I call for the instrument of revocation. I will not accept the toasts and harangues with which the 4th of July meetings may have frightened honorable gentlemen. I will not accept those indecent resolutions which interested demagogues may have persuaded their knots of partisans to adopt at their electioneering conventions. Nor will I recognise the officious intermeddlings of State Legislatures upon a subject with which they have no Constitutional concern. I call for a revocation of these grants, not carried by acclamation, but made and executed in the manner which the people themselves have prescribed. If no such revocation can be produced, the grants remain in full and valid force, and the several branches of our Government continue to hold, exclusively, and without the participation of any power on earth, the independent right to legislate, to judge, and to execute. This right they have solemnly sworn to execute; and to surrender it, even to the people themselves, would be as clear a violation of the Constitution as an attempt to transfer it to an aristocracy or a monarchy. They cannot surrender it without resolving the Government into its original elements, nor can the people violently resume it without prostrating the Constitution of their country.

Against these conclusions I know gentlemen will exclaim with much apparent surprise and horror. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) has already done so. What, he asks, are not the people the creator, the Representative the creature? The former the master, the latter the servant? And is the creature independent of the creator—the servant above the master?

Sir, by the use of names nothing is proved; and an argument resting alone on such a basis hardly deserves examination or answer.

But, if an answer be necessary, it is to be found in the Constitution. The objection implies, that if the people may not instruct with obligatory force the Representative, he is independent of the people. This notion, Mr. Speaker, is founded on a total misconception of the theory and nature of our system; it supposes that the checks upon the abuse of power by their rulers, retained by the people, was a right at all times to interfere with all their acts, and to participate in the exercise of all their powers and duties. Widely and totally distinct from such a system is the actual plan of our Government. I have already remarked, that the sovereign powers of Government were delegated in distinct portions to different and distinct rulers.

But the people well knew the tendency of power to corrupt its possessors—to degenerate into abuse and oppression. Against such corruptions, abuses, and oppressions in their rulers, they resolved to hold in their own hands checks the most effectual, securities the most powerful, which were consistent with the nature of the system. These checks and guards consisted in the direct and indirect responsibility of the rulers continually or periodically to the people themselves. Thus the judges are constantly, though indirectly, responsible to the people for all their judicial conduct—they are subject at all times to impeachment by this House, the immediate representatives of the people.

The President is responsible every fourth year directly to the people—for he then descends to their level, and depends upon their will for a re-elevation. But as that dependence is not direct, he is also constantly subject to punishment for misconduct by impeachment at the instance of this House.

The members of the Senate are periodically, though indirectly, responsible to the people through their State Legislatures.

The members of this House are every second year responsible directly to the people. At that short period they sink into the great public mass, and their official conduct, stripped of all adventitious aids, lies unveiled and naked to the inspection of the people. Can the wisdom of man contrive a more perfect security against all dangerous abuse of power?

The immediate Representatives of the people, biennially brought before the people, stripped of all power, and wholly dependent on their will for continued official existence. The Executive, every fourth year, subjected to the same responsibility, and the same dependence, while both he and every judge are responsible for their conduct through the right of impeachment vested in this House. This, sir, is the true theory and spirit of our representative Government. Responsibility for conduct, not control over it, while in office, is the real secret of our safety.

This is the great and active principle which pervades our Constitution, and, like gravitation in the great solar system, confines each body to its orbit, regulates the whole machinery of our Government, and produces in all its parts that order and harmony, and perfect safety, which was the great object of its creation.

In this cursory view of the nature of our system is found a perfect answer to the objections and exclamations of the honorable gentleman from Virginia.

The Representative is not independent of the people, or, if other language better please him, (it pleases not me,) the creature is not independent of the creator; the servant is not above his master. But his subordination and dependence is that, and that only, which is defined in that instrument, by adopting which the people spoke him into existence. If a biennial responsibility, the responsibility of a man endowed with reason, volition, free agency, and the power while a Representative to use them according to his best judgment, uncontrolled by any paramount authority whatsoever; such and such only is the dependence in any degree sanctioned by the spirit of a representative Government.

This Constitutional responsibility, the manly and patriotic dependence of a rational being, the proud and dignified submission of an American freeman and Representative, to the only sovereign of his country, is totally subverted by this new doctrine of obligatory instruction. Under its influence, when, on the day of election, he shall meet the people, no more can they demand from him evidence of his ability, his integrity, his fidelity to the Constitution, and the interests of the State. "Has he never deviated from our instructions? Has he constantly opened his ear to every popular clamor, and with a conscience sufficiently supple, and a spirit sufficiently abject, bent and bowed to every blast of the popular breath that has passed over him?" Consistent with this doctrine of express and implied instruction, questions of this character alone can be required to answer.

And what must be the effect on the character and conduct of this House? No longer will the great considerations that influence its conduct be—what is just, what is expedient, what is wise, what is Constitutional—what do the exigencies of the Republic demand? No, in every act of legislation, the Representative must cast his eye back to his district. How points the political weathercock now; which way flows the popular current; what is the whim of my district; what is the voice of my State; what is the clamor of the day? These must become the great objects of solicitude, and, as these questions are answered, he will say aye or no to every measure. And thus the great benefits of a Representative Republic are wholly sacrificed. All the value of political science, experience, and firmness in the Representatives is thrown away; all the lights of superior wisdom and able discussion are blown out. The legislator becomes an automaton, to be danced on this floor by wires to be held and managed by those active and turbulent demagogues, who, in succession, become the leaders of the people. Oh! then, indeed, it shall matter little what shall be the compensation for services here; for what shall it matter who may occupy these chairs? Be he wise or be he foolish; be he learned or be he ignorant; with brains or without brains, it is all the same. If he has skill to spell out his instructions, and to snuff at a goodly distance the tainted gale of popularity; if he has sense enough to understand the affirmative from the negative, and a tongue to cry aye and no, he is armed cap-a-pie for legislation—he is fully qualified to perform all the duties of an instructed Representative.

Sir, were we to examine all the musty folios of political empiricism; were we to wade through the innumerable visions of political dreamers since the flood, to find that principle most repugnant to our system of government, most degrading to our rulers, and most destructive to our prosperity—in my conscience, and on my honor, I believe we might return to this doctrine of obligatory instruction, as the one which combined in itself, and in its consequences, as much of all these qualities as any other.

But, Mr. Speaker, were this doctrine as consonant with the spirit and structure of our Government, as it is repugnant to its principles and subversive of its benefits, it is yet wholly absurd, because it is impracticable. If the right of the people to instruct, and the obligation on the Representative to obey do really exist, is it not very strange that we do not find in the Constitution, in the laws, or in the principles of our system, some method presented, in which the right may be exercised, and the obligation enforced? Is it not idle to talk of a perpetual power which cannot be executed by its possessor, or of an obligation which can, by no possible means, be legally enforced? How are the people to exercise this right of instruction? Shall each district instruct its Representative? Some gentlemen have said so. But, may I ask these gentlemen where, in the Constitution, they find a recognition of such a political division as a district? "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." The people and the States are recognised as separate and distinct political powers; but where does the district derive any distinct political power, to interfere in the Government of the Union? Sir, the district is the creature of a State—created for the convenience of suffrage—subject, at any time, to lose all separate existence by an act of the State, or the Legislature of the Union. And whence do honorable gentlemen derive another position, which their arguments clearly imply, that, in this House, the Representative dwindles down to the mere agent of a district? For myself I disclaim the idea, as equally unconstitutional and degrading.

When a member enters this Hall, he becomes a Representative of the people of this Republic—he becomes a legislator for the whole American community. What are his duties? Do they constitute him merely the guardian of his district? Are they confined to the little corners of townships and counties? No; they embrace the rights, the interests, and happiness of a great Republic. They "insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;" these are the sublime and comprehensive terms in which the people have taught to all their Representatives the great duties of their stations. Can we possess a feeling and a spirit requisite for the performance of these great and general duties, if we consider ourselves the mere Representatives of distinct sections of the people? Can we act well for the great interests of the whole, if we degrade ourselves into the separate and distinct guardians of separate and distinct parts of the community? And yet, if I understood the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) correctly, he considers himself the Representative of his district alone; for when he spoke of submission to instructions, it was exclusively to the instructions of the people of his district to which he alluded. To their will he would surrender all. [Mr. TYLER assented.] O, then, said Mr. G., I conjure the gentleman to proceed with the utmost caution. Do I yet understand him correctly? He would surrender his judgment, his conscience, his independence as a Representative on this floor, to the will and instruction of those who elected him. [Mr. TYLER still assented.] Sir, continued Mr. G., I would appeal to his judgment, his heart—to all his manly and moral feelings—against this pernicious theory. Surely he would demand, before he made the promised sacrifice, that the voice he was about to worship should be that of a clear majority. Upon any given measure—upon the very measure before the House—how can he ascertain that majority? Is there any method prescribed in the Constitution or the law? No; he must watch, and listen, and catch the voice of his district, as it floats on the breeze; or he must read it, if he can, in the popular shouts which issue from partial meetings and conventions of the people. Sir, I have seen much of these popular conventions; I have seen one orator mount the table, and, as he developed his political opinions and conduct, I have seen the hats, and the caps, and the shouts of approbation fill the very heavens. I have seen another succeed him; and, as he developed opinions and conduct exactly opposite, again I have seen the hats and the caps blacken the air, and the earth shake with thunders of applause. Has the honorable gentleman any political crucible into which he may cast these clamors, and separate the true from the false? And, then, has he any balance to show him which is preponderant? May he not mistake the importunate clack of a few ephemeral noisy insects of his district, for the voice of the real tenants of the soil?

Sir, let the honorable gentleman beware! The sacrifice he offers is not one of indifferent value; it is not, indeed, the blood of the victim, but may it not be the soul of the Representative?

Conscience! Judgment! Independence! These are offerings too sacred to be thrown away on false deities; and yet, in the nature of things, when he lays them on the altar, he can have no security that it is erected to the real vox populi—the true god of his idolatry. But suppose certainly be fully attainable; suppose every Representative instructed at all points, on every subject which comes before him, what a babel of legislation would this House present! Local prejudices, narrow feelings, headlong violence must enter this Hall; and here, uninformed by discussion, unmitigated by sober reflection, and, in their very nature, incapable of compromise, would be seen in disgraceful and endless collision.

Sir, against principles pregnant with such partial consequences, so repugnant to the spirit of our Constitution, and so subversive of all the benefits of a Representative system, I will forever enter my solemn protest; and I do it the more confidently, because I do it after the example of the first and wisest statesmen of England. In that nation the question is settled. The authority of the elder Pitt, of Burke, and of Fox, and other statesmen, who best understood and loved, as the friend of their liberties, the representative part of their government, has placed the stamp of absurdity on the doctrine of instruction; and, at this day, no man of high talent and integrity in the British Commons, however he may plunge into the current of opposition, does sanction that principle. But it seems the authority of Burke is of little value here, because he was a pensioner. What was the color of that great man's political existence?

Edmund Burke was a Whig of the old English school. He was in his youth an enthusiastic friend of liberty—even an intemperate advocate for the rights of the human race; in maturer years, he was the steady champion of the popular principles of his Government, which constitute and secure the liberties of the English nation; and in his old age he rose with all the ardor of his youth, and all the vigor of his maturity, to rescue the civilized world from that monster of popular despotism which rose in France, was nurtured on human blood, and aspired to demolish every wise, and free, and just, and merciful, and holy institution on the earth. And when, at last, worn out in the service of mankind, he retired to the bed of sorrow and despair, then, and not till then, his grateful country imparted to him a pittance, hardly sufficient to render comfortable the last stage of his journey to the grave. The judgment of the civilized world has been solemnly pronounced. The fame of the orator, statesman, patriot, is embalmed in the gratitude of the four quarters of the globe. His voice was heard in favor of the justice of our cause, when we struggled against British oppression. He devoted years of his life to avenge the wrongs and desolation of India. The untutored African was learned to bless the name of his benefactor; and Europe must ever acknowledge that he first read the handwriting on the wall of revolutionary France, and made known the interpretation thereof. Nor can any friend of virtue, religion, or civil liberty, deny that, in the last great act of his life, when he raised the veil from the anarchy, atheism, and ambitious despotism of the French Revolution, he was, at the least, as genuine a champion of civil liberty and human happiness as at any period of his existence. Such was the man who preached and practised the doctrine I am feebly supporting. He preached and practised it at a time, too, when he was glowing in the full vigor of his wonderful faculties—when, in the British Commons, he was engaged in our cause, and with a vigorous arm was daily beating down the weapons which Bute, and North, and Hillsborough, were aiming at our existence. What authority, merely human, can be stronger?

But an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONNER) has told us, that the principle I advocate is an English principle; and he has cautioned us not to borrow principles from England. Sir, I would borrow no political principle from England, or any other country, which was not stamped with wisdom, which the great test of experience had not proved to be friendly to civil liberty. Would the honorable gentleman exclude from our code principles of such a character, because they were discovered in other countries or other ages? If he would, it is well for us that he did not live in the earlier times of our Republic. His zeal and activity might have borne him into power, and we might have lost some of the best and wisest principles of our free and happy system of government. Will the honorable gentleman peruse the bills of rights and constitutions of the States? He will there find principles borrowed from England, and scattered through them all. Nay, will he open, with me, the Constitution of this Republic? The trial by jury is of Saxon origin; here it is reserved to the people as their grand bulwark against oppression. The writ of habeas corpus is of English origin; here it is secured to the people as the grand palladium of their personal rights and liberties. The idea of an independent judiciary here perfected, had we not that from England?

Let me point the honorable gentleman to his own State. That wonderful fabric of human wisdom, the common law of Massachusetts, under the guardian influence of which he sleeps in the most perfect security—whence were its principles derived? Whence, but from England? Would the honorable gentleman exclude all these from our code, because they first blessed the country where the bones of our ancestors are buried? Such was not the spirit of our fathers. When they first raised their voices in remonstrance against the English ministry, and their arms in battle against the English nation, on what principles did they justify their conduct; on what grounds did they rest their great and sacred cause? Let the numerous appeals of the Old Congress to America, to England, and to the world furnish an answer. Let that immortal enumeration of our rights and our wrongs—the Declaration of Independence—answer the question. Their birthright was civil and religious liberty, founded on the principles and maxims of the English law and constitution. These were grossly and perseveringly violated by the King, Ministry, and Parliament. To secure the enjoyment of their birthright they first took up arms, and they did not relinquish them until the object was more than accomplished.

The fathers of our Republic were educated in the Whig school of England. The great masters of that school were Locke, and Sidney, Russell, and Hampden, and a host of patriots who suffered persecution and martyrdom for their political faith. They had derived the spirit of patriotism from the ancient Republics; a spirit of independence from the examples and traditions of their Saxon ancestors, and infusing that spirit into the natural and practical principles of the common law, they established wise and beneficent maxims of civil government. It was in this school, in company with the elder Pitt, and Burke, and Fox, and their compatriots, that the artificers of our system learnt their maxims of political, civil, and religious liberty. They discarded from their system the lumber of the dark ages, and all the cumbersome trappings of a monarchy and a titled aristocracy. They founded a Republic. But into its very soul they infused that genuine spirit, and those essential principles of civil liberty, for which the illustrious whigs of England have in all ages offered up their lives.

Sir, permit me to add a few words upon what is called the "voice" of this whole people, and I have done.

We are told, that the voice of this whole nation has pronounced a condemnation of the law of the last session, and commanded its repeal.

Were this even so, were I sure it were so, still I would not obey them—I believe, in my best judgment, in my conscience, and before my God, I believe, that the law of last session was and is, in itself, just and Constitutional, and most favorable to the purity, the independence of this House, the durability of this Government, and the security of this people. To no human "voice" will I surrender opinions thus maturely and finally settled; on no human altar will I sacrifice my judgment, my reason, and my conscience.

Do I then disregard the "voice of the people"—the "will of the public?" O, no. In making up my mind upon almost every subject of legislation, that voice would have a powerful influence. I would always view it as a fact, a most important fact, entering into the argument and the reasoning, when I was about to decide on any public measure. On many questions it might, on some it certainly would be conclusive—not because it contains, in itself, any moral, political, or Constitutional authority to control my judgment or conduct, but because, from the nature of the question, it might constitute a fact or circumstance, so important as to prevail over every other.

To borrow an illustration of my idea from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN.) The question of declaring or not declaring war, however just and necessary I might deem it, would be a question of this kind. I would no more declare even such a war against the general voice and will of the people, than I would declare it, with the nation destitute of arms, ammunition, and money—and precisely for the same reason, because the former is as essential to the success of a war, as the latter. It is a question solely of expediency, not of Constitutional obligation. But reverse the proposition: suppose the voice of the people distinctly in favor of declaring war, which I in my conscience believed would be unjust and ruinous to the country, should I vote for such a war? No, sir, if the voice of every man in the nation should thunder instructions in my ears, I would still say no—I would struggle for peace against the people themselves; and if I should fall in the struggle, the peace of a good conscience would afford me more real happiness than all the plaudits of the people could bestow on him, who might rise on my ruin. Sir, I would not be misunderstood. I am not one of those, if any such there be, who hold the political heresy, that the people are their own worst enemies. I believe the people of this Republic to be lovers of honesty, friends of civil order, and as well enlightened in their interests, as any people on earth—and I know equally well, that they always decide honestly, and when reflection, discussion, and knowledge precede decision, in general correctly.

But I should have read history in vain, I should have lived the last ten years of my life worse than in vain, if I did not know how easy it sometimes is, to rouse the popular prejudice and clamor against any measure, and particularly one of the character of the law of last session. Are gentlemen perfectly sure that this universal uproar, from Maine to St. Mary's, which even yet seems to be ringing in their ears, is not the mere clamor of prejudice, of ignorance, of deception? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ross) has addressed to them a solemn warning. May not this vituperated measure, when the excitement of the hour shall have passed away, become a favorite of the people? Gentlemen may read striking examples of this kind, even in their own political history.

Who has forgotten the horrible anathemas which rolled through the country against the British Treaty of 1795—yet, has not popular applause awaited the negotiators of that which we now have, every way inferior as it is? How long is it, since instructions poured in from all quarters against a National Bank? How long since the people were excited even to frenzy for its destruction? And yet it has now become the very darling of the people; the sheet-anchor of the Treasury. How long is it since the Navy was a voracious beast, ready to swallow the Treasury at a breakfast, to the great terror of every exclusive patriot of the nation? Now, who so bold to hint one word of disapprobation! I might mention many other measures. Restrictions, gunboats, embargoes, all received at their first appearance with the loudest applause, and in short periods, accompanied in their exits by an universal concert of hisses and execrations. The people must think and decide twice, and the second is generally that of calm reflection and judicious decision.

The clamor that has been heard against the law of last session has not one attribute of the calm enlightened voice of the people. Had I time to traverse each State, and exhibit the rise, progress, and issue of the clamor in each, I think this fact would not be doubted. But this I must forego. Yet I will state two facts, already attested by several gentlemen in the debate, which do strongly corroborate my opinion. The supposed indignation of the people was not at all confined to the authors of the law. The clamor was indiscriminate. Those who opposed the law, and only because they received the pay—the pay to which they were legally and justly entitled, and to refuse which, I should have deemed the grossest affectation of delicacy—had their full share of execration. And numbers fell victims to this unjust and indiscriminate rage.

Again, many gentlemen have declared that it was not the increase of compensation, but the change in the form, which gave umbrage to the districts from which they come—that the most of the clamor we have heard, was not against the amount, but the form of the compensation.

Why, sir, if this be so, the spectacle is indeed ludicrous. The adage is reversed; the mouse has brought forth the mountain. In this view of the subject, well might my friend (Mr. HULBERT) exclaim of this people, "they resemble ocean into tempest wrought, to waft a feather, or to drown a fly."

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the settled, calm, enlightened voice of the people has not been heard upon the law of last session.

Shall I be asked, whence then all this popular clamor, and indignation and execration? It has many sources and numerous causes; I will mention two of the most prominent: There are many gentlemen within these walls who have occupied their seats too long for those who are waiting without. When we came here, we all must have left behind us numerous demagogues who were office expectants: they were impatiently waiting for some favorable occasion to buy your seats and to succeed to your places. Hitherto they had found no measure fitted to their use; upon all prominent measures, the two great parties had been divided and committed almost to a man; and to attack any member for his conduct upon any of these measures, was sure to enlist in his defence and support the party to which he belonged. The attempt was too desperate even for a finished demagogue. The law of last session was passed; it was above all others fitted to become an instrument in the hands of office hunters to deceive the people—it was a measure ostensibly personal to the Representative, in which his interest seemed alone to be connected. "It took money from the people; it put the money in the pocket of the Representative; it was of course a selfish, unjust, and corrupt measure." Involving no party sympathies, and apparently no national interests, how easy was it for artful men, pretended patriots, to impose this view of the subject upon a people, honest, unsuspecting of deception, but always peculiarly sensitive upon all measures of expenditure. In this view it was seized by the expectants of office; in this view it was widely and incessantly pressed upon the public; and to this narrow, unjust, and wicked view of the measure, palmed upon the people, do I ascribe much of the clamor that was heard against it.

But there was another and a more powerful cause. In several of the States, the elections were approaching. Though the rage of party spirit had in a good degree subsided in the General Government, it remained unmitigated in these States, and this law was seized upon with avidity for the purpose of influencing those elections. Truth compels me to confess, that the party to which I belong were the first to engage in what I must ever deem a disgraceful attempt to render the law odious to the people, and to cast the odium upon the friends of the Administration. The attack being thus commenced, the adverse party not only repelled it, but attempted to carry the war into the territories of the assailants, and thus commenced a conflict, which in its progress would have been really ludicrous, were it not for the permanent injury it may have inflicted on this House and many of its most worthiest members. Almost every other instrument of party annoyance was thrown aside; all other sins of the Government and the Opposition forgotten and forgiven, and the unfortunate "compensation bill," as it was called, became the very foot ball of the parties. It was kicked by stump orators, bar-room slang-whangers, by editors of all parties, by candidates for all kinds of offices, and partisans of all colors and capacities, even gentlemen of science and liberal views did not disdain the sport—the very bull-dogs of both the parties, who in those times have generally pursued game of higher flavor, who have delighted to mangle honest sensibility, devour reputation, and hunt down talents and independence, seemed to forsake all their former propensities to pursue in full cry this scape-goat of all political offences. The justice, the expediency, the real merits of the law seemed totally out of the question. "It takes money from the people; that money goes to the Representative; it is private robbery and public plunder." This was the short argument and modest conclusion of every party logician. And which party has perpetrated the offence? was the great question at issue. Crimination and recrimination, denunciation and retort, violence, abuse, and clamor filled the whole country. Mr. Speaker, I do in my conscience believe, that such are the two principal causes, and such the nature and character of the greatest part of that clamor, which has existed against the law of last session—and is it such a clamor, that an American Representative is required to surrender his judgment, his conscience, and independence? Is such the "voice" which is to wither the spirit of American freemen, and degrade the legislator into an automaton or a slave? Sir, I know not, and I care not, what other men may think or do, but for my single self, I would sooner be a dog, and bay the moon, than such a Representative.

Mr. THOMAS WILSON then moved to fill the blanks, both as to the per diem and the allowance for every twenty miles' travelling, with "eight."

The debate was resumed on this question, and continued till near sunset, when the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 20.

Mr. GASTON presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, remonstrating against the act of Congress, passed in the year 1806, entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," and setting forth the injustice practised upon persons holding grants of the said lands, issued by the State of North Carolina, and praying that the right of that State to perfect titles in the territory south and west of Elk River line, not only upon the entries and warrants originally laid there, but also upon those laid originally in what is now called East Tennessee, may be confirmed. And that a Board of Commissioners may be authorized and appointed, one by each of the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, and one by the United States, to adjudicate all warrants and entries of lands in question, and pronounce upon their validity, and that a preference may be given to entries and warrants issued by North Carolina over those issued by Tennessee; or that the said act of 1806 may be repealed, so far as the same conflicts with the rights of the State of North Carolina.

The memorial being read, Mr. GASTON moved that it be referred to a select committee, as, from the importance of the subject, it required the most deliberate and dispassionate consideration.

Mr. CANNON moved that the subject lie on the table, in order to give time for the arrival of material information on the subject, expected from the Executive of Tennessee.

After some discussion, in which Messrs. GASTON, YANCEY, and CULPEPER, opposed laying the report on the table, and Messrs. CANNON and REYNOLDS advocated that course, the memorial was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. GASTON, CANNON, YANCEY, THOMAS, BRECKENRIDGE, McKEE, and CREIGHTON, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the petition of the President and Board of Managers of the American Society for colonizing the free people of color, was referred to the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to the African slave trade.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, the petition of the Society of Friends in the State of North Carolina was referred to the same committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1817; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to allot rooms to the Committees of each House, was read the third time, and passed; and Mr. SHARP and Mr. YANCEY were appointed on the part of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the "joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to allot rooms to the Committees of each House," and have appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings be instructed to report to this House what causes have retarded the repairs of the south wing of the Capitol, and at what time its preparation for the reception of the House of Representatives may be reasonably anticipated.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Joseph Stewart and others;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

PETITION OF JAMES WARE.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the same committee, also made a report on the petition of James Ware; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that he was a seafaring man, and accustomed to get his living by that profession until the 10th day of January, 1815; that at that time he was employed by the United States naval storekeeper at New York, at the daily wages of one dollar and a half, in unloading heavy cannon from on board the sloop General Washington, and then loading them on teams, for the purpose of transportation to the Lakes; that while executing this duty, and on the day above mentioned, he was caught under a 32-pounder cannon, which fell on his leg by the breaking of a runner, and so injured it that he was compelled to have it amputated; that he is unable to pursue his calling of a seafaring man, and is destitute of the means of support, and prays to be placed on the list of navy pensioners, or to be provided for in some other way.

The committee, on due consideration of this subject, are of opinion that neither precedent nor principle would authorize the petitioner to be placed on the navy pension fund; that fund having been constituted in a particular way, for special purposes, within the purview of which the case of the petitioner does not come. On the question of providing for the case of the petitioner in some other mode, this committee are not as well qualified to judge as another committee of this body. From examination and reflection, however, they are of opinion that no provision, by way of pension or in any other mode, has been made by the United States for persons similarly situated with the petitioner. They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

THE COMPENSATION LAW.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to repeal the act of last session, to change the mode of compensation to the members of Congress—the motion to fill the blank with "eight" dollars being still under consideration.

Mr. WOODWARD, of South Carolina, said it seemed to have become the fashion of the day to make this floor the theatre where experiences were to be exhibited. Although in general he was not very fashionable, he begged the liberty of becoming so for once until he should exhibit his experience. If I could believe, said Mr. W., the fifteen hundred dollars were more in value than the six dollars per day was in 1789, when that Congress established the wages, I should really take conviction for having voted for it, but when I recollect that everything the staple commodity of our country has appreciated to a treble amount, and that money has depreciated in an equal degree, I am still satisfied I voted for the compensation last session, and am perfectly convinced it would take two thousand dollars to make the salary as good as the original six dollars in 1789. It will be recollected there was no money that we could take, (it is true there were some rags manufactured and stamped, which we called money,) but it was not money. I thought then if we had depreciated the money and took the value of the six dollars per day in '89, it would have done as well as to have passed the law we did.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

I recollect, about the close of the Revolutionary war, the South Carolina Legislature made a scale of depreciation in which they allowed (I believe) fifty-two and a half continental dollars for one of silver. By reference to the records it will be seen that the ten last sessions upon an average at six dollars per day, amounts to one thousand one hundred and ten dollars. The excess added by this House last session is three hundred and ninety dollars, which is about one cent and a seventh per each constituent; say put down one thousand dollars and then add one cent for each constituent, there being thirty-five thousand, make three hundred and fifty dollars; take the seventh of three hundred and fifty dollars and it will make fifty dollars; add the whole together, and it makes fifteen hundred and ten dollars. I cannot believe the intelligent people of the United States can get the hydrophobia, neither in part nor in whole, for a cent and a seventh part of a cent.

Mr. Speaker, not anticipating that it was the intention of gentlemen to raise the travelling expenses, I voted for nine dollars, but have now voted against it, taking eight dollars for my minimum; to give eight dollars for travelling every twenty miles, and eight dollars for every day in session, will make, in amount, nearly the fifteen hundred dollars. If, therefore, that sum can be obtained, I will vote for the bill now before us; if it cannot be obtained, I will vote against the whole bill. The enlightened of my constituents, with whom I have conversed for the most part, say they are willing the sum should be ten dollars per day. Gentlemen say they believe the fifteen hundred dollars is nothing more than justice, but that the voice of the people must be obeyed. I respect the voice of the people, and would obey it in a certain degree, but deny the people have given any formal or Constitutional voice upon the subject. If those gentlemen (that say the people) would examine every individual, they would find a majority that would not be willing to give three dollars per day. I do verily believe there are but a few enlightened characters (compared to the great mass) that govern the rest; it is their voice I would accede to. Some time before I left home I was informed from a respectable source that a certain person in conversation did me the honor to mention my name as one who voted for the compensation, and said he would be willing to allow two dollars per day, and no more. I do not wish to excite levity, as a sincere solemnity becomes the selected wisdom of the United States, when acting on their important business; but will give you another fact: There were several persons together at a neighbor's house; the neighbor wishing to mark some of his hogs, examined the almanac to find when the dog days would expire, and, when he could not find them, swore that Congress had destroyed all the dog days, and that myself was the instigator; for which I should never come here again. Is this the voice of the people? Every possible step has been taken to ferment by unjust definitions and by positive fabrication, but I believe the vociferous cry of the enlightened is, change the mode. Gentlemen say the Congress of 1789 did not intend a compensation for services rendered, but for their expenses only. I beg the liberty of differing in opinion with them. Let it be remembered we had just passed through a heavy and disastrous war, when the last farthing was spent and the nation involved, with a heavy debt hanging over our heads. It will also be recollected that our houses were plundered, plantations burned, cattle hamstringed, and almost every vestige of property taken off, and from those patriots of the Revolution who bought our liberties at the price of blood and treasure, and for which they have never been paid, nor can they be paid. Money was then truly valuable, and six dollars per day was an ample compensation. The Congress of '89, from viewing the changes that had existed in other countries, knew that similar causes would exist here, at some period which would produce similar effects, therefore left it in the Constitution for every Congress to exercise their discretion, and according to circumstances award their own compensation. This, however, from delicacy, was neglected until necessity made it a duty. They, therefore, allowed themselves the nominal amount of fifteen hundred dollars, and changed the mode.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer, but have paid some attention to books and legal decisions; that, together with the Constitution which lies before me, induces me to believe this House is not competent, Constitutionally, to pass any law on the subject that could take effect until the next session. It will be recollected by this House that we are not a corporate body by voluntary obligation, or by articles of organization, subscribed to. If they were, they for themselves could pass any act they pleased, and give it effect when they pleased; but the law of last session, applying to the year and recognising individuals, does, in my humble opinion, vest an individual right in each member on this floor, commencing with the first Monday in December last, which right this House have not power to impair.

The compensation for last year was due the 4th of March past, and the vested right of each individual becomes due the 4th of March next. Why not, then, dispense with the bill? If it does not carry at the eight dollars per day, and eight dollars for every twenty miles, I will vote against it, for I never will vote a sum to myself, and believe it just, that I would not give to my honorable successor; but it will be said they have wickedly inflamed the people for the purpose of riding into popularity at the expense of others. Be it so; it is yet better to feed five dogs than to perish one child. In this expression I have no allusion to any one on this floor. There are a number of valuable gentlemen on this floor that will come again, perhaps some may be elected on their pledges to their constituents to repeal the law of compensation to members of Congress who may not be worth fifteen shillings, they may in fact be fifteen hundred dollars worse than nothing, but still I should be glad the law now about to be repealed, should be left to the next Congress, that they might have the whole of the honor—they coming immediately from the people, as warm as a newly-cooked mess of pottage, when they might pass a law which would amalgamate with the wishes of the people. The people will cook them to their own mind. With respect to instructions, and obedience to instructors, I know and respect all my friends, and freely reciprocate with them at my own house or theirs, but in my official capacity I determine to know nothing but my duty—the duty assigned to me by the Constitution which I am sworn to preserve.

Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, said, having been necessarily prevented from recording his vote on the questions for filling the blanks, he would express his opinion in a few words. The proper amount of compensation for members of this body is in itself a plain question, and should be determined by the same rule which regulates the wages of persons performing other services; by asking the question, how much would be considered a fair satisfaction for any other service requiring the same skill, integrity, and attention? Of what class (asked Mr. P.) were the duties of Representatives in Congress? They were such that if the best talents of the country were not always requisite, the best talents are certainly not too good to be employed in directing the national concerns.

And would the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum be extravagant as a compensation to any agent, either public or private, requiring the same skill, integrity, and attention, and subjected to the same expenses and sacrifices? No gentleman has pretended to say that six dollars per day was a sufficient compensation for the services of a member, though it might more than defray his expenses.

And all agree that fifteen hundred dollars a year is not too much. Being of this opinion, and knowing that the Constitution expressly gave Congress the power of providing by law for the compensation of its members, I took on myself the responsibility of voting for the law of last session. I am still of the same opinion I was then, and, while I am willing to change the mode into a daily sum, I am in favor of such a sum as will be about equivalent to the same compensation in amount. Believing that eight dollars per day would be very nearly such a sum, I shall vote for that amount, and, if present, would have voted for filling the blank with nine.

On this subject, more than any other, has the popular opinion been brought into view. And as it is usual to call into notice the sentiments of our constituents, I will be excused in mentioning the opinions of the people I have the honor to represent. In my opinion, they do not differ much from the opinions elsewhere expressed. But this I have the pleasure of saying, that my immediate constituents have exercised their opinions with so much temperance and decent consideration, that I feel bound to pay the highest respect to their wishes. So far as I have learnt their opinions on the law in question, they do not object to the increased amount of pay, but to the salary mode. In this respect, I think their ideas are correct. I would at last session have preferred a daily increase, but no such plan was presented, and no other prospect of an increase, but in the mode adopted. While I doubted whether that mode would suit as well, I considered it, what it has proved to be, an experiment, always capable of being repealed whenever its inutility was discovered; and therefore I deemed the mode of little importance.

Through respect to my own opinion, as well as that of my constituents, I am desirous of changing the pay to a per diem allowance; but, in doing this, I am unwilling to reduce the pay of those who will serve hereafter, materially lower than the present amount, but rather leave it for them to establish for themselves. The character of this body ought to be noticed with more concern than individual responsibility. Individuals may shape a course for themselves, which they deem consistent and justifiable, but this is not a matter noticed by foreigners, or in future times. Without remarking what persons voted on the respective sides, now and at the last session, the act will be viewed in the gross—one session adopting a measure, and the next shuffling back. Some gentlemen talk of a retrospective repeal of the law. If such course be at all proper, we ought not to stop with the first of this session, but reach back to the beginning of the law, as proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. The refunding, for a few weeks of this session, will show an obvious wish to save appearances. It will be more absurd still: it will be tantamount to an admission of immorality in the passage of the law, and in receiving the wages under it. For, having a property vested in the compensation, for which services have already been rendered, nothing can impair our title to it but a want of equity.

There appears some delicacy in one point—the object of the law being the benefit of those who passed it. This at first appeared objectionable to me. When, however, it is considered that this is the only body competent by the Constitution to make such provision, it cannot be improper when the amount is reasonable. Several of the State Legislatures fix their own pay at each session. This is the case in North Carolina. The members there are paid in no other way, but by their own resolution at the same session. It is true, they rarely differ in the rate of pay, but it is the same in principle and in character with the law of the last session of Congress.

In the course of my experience, I have never given a vote more conscientious than that of last session in favor of this law. I thought it right, and the amount rather under than over the fair compensation. I thought it expedient for reasons explained fully by other gentlemen, and by the report of the committee on this subject; and, under these impressions, I met the responsibility of supporting it with my vote.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, said, that so much had already been said upon this subject, he was aware he could offer no sufficient apology for occupying the time of the House, at this late period of the debate, with any remarks of his. He trusted, however, he should be indulged a few moments, while he briefly assigned the reasons and motives which would determine his vote.

I would not have risen now, said Mr. E., if it were not for a remark which fell from my worthy colleague (Mr. PICKENS) who just sat down. Sir, misrepresentation has been fashionable on this subject. Opinions and motives have been ascribed to gentlemen, which I most conscientiously believe were never felt or entertained. It is that my motives and my opinions may not rest upon conjecture—may not be mistaken—that I ask this short indulgence. The gentleman has said, that he has not heard the opinion that six dollars per day was sufficient for the support of members, advanced in this House. Sir, I voted for that sum; I deemed it sufficient. Does the gentleman believe, that, if I thought a higher sum necessary, I would shrink from my duty? that I would entertain one opinion and express another by my vote?

[Here Mr. PICKENS explained, that it was not sufficient compensation for services, as well as for support.]

I did not understand my friend so perfectly before. I thought his remark calculated to make improper impressions.

I was, Mr. Speaker, favorable to the bill reported by the Committee of the Whole, because I believed the pay proposed to be given by it amply sufficient for the genteel and comfortable maintenance of a member here alone. Beyond that sum, I am not prepared at this time to say we ought to go. It is this principle by which I shall be guided in my vote. It governed me at the last session; it remains unchanged. And I submit to gentlemen, if they increase the compensation so high as to make it a moneyed consideration to the low and grovelling mind—I know it could not be so to honorable minds—so high as to exceed the measure of expenses only; if they would not hold out a reward to exertion, stratagem, and intrigue, in your elections; to that course of conduct which the man of high and elevated feelings, worthy to be enrolled among your statesmen, would disdain to stoop to; and instead of putting better materials into this body, would have the opposite effect. I humbly conceive such would be the case.

But, we are told by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) that this increased compensation would open the door to preferment, to honors, and to distinction, wide; that it would enable men of all ranks and grades in life to come here. Sir, this is a desirable object, and I should rejoice to see it attained; but if the compensation is to indemnify the losses and sacrifices occasioned by absence from professional or domestic pursuits, as well as compensation for services, I cannot believe that the pitiful sum of fifteen hundred dollars, or a per diem equal to it, would effect that object. Besides, we have no data by which to fix on an adequate compensation for that purpose. The sacrifices which some gentlemen make, are far greater than those of others. The highest pay would scarcely remunerate some. Taking, then, the principle I set out with, that the compensation should be fully sufficient for the comfortable and genteel support of members, and their reward the distinction and honor of their stations, I must vote against the proposition to fill the blank with eight dollars, and in favor of that of six, if it should again be made.

As to the question of the right of instruction, about which we have heard so much, I will not trespass upon the patience of the House with any remarks of mine. I leave that to be decided by those who have received instructions. When I shall receive any, I trust I shall not be wanting in that respect and consideration for them, to which the high and respectable source from which they come entitle them. I shall never be indifferent to the public will; to that I shall always hold myself accountable. My constituents, however, have not instructed me upon this subject. They are not to be agitated by every little gale—and my only wish is, that upon this, and every other occasion, my conduct may be such as to promote their interests, and the interests of my country.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Delaware, said, he asked the indulgence of the House for a short time, while he endeavored to explain his views of the subject. It was to be remarked that most of the gentlemen who had spoken, seemed to concede that the law of the last session did not grant too high a compensation to the members of Congress, but their opposition to it arose from a different source; that the people were against it; their voice had been heard, and must be obeyed. Before entering into this subject, before inquiring into the right of the constituent to instruct his Representative, and the obligatory force of such instruction, Mr. C. begged to know what evidence there was of such instructions. It was not pretended that any precise and written instructions had been given: it was implied. From what? The noise and clamor which had been excited from one end of the Union to the other? Is this such an expression of the public will as ought to be regarded by any wise or prudent man? He hoped the time was not yet come when the follies and passions of the people were to be flattered in this House. The calm and deliberate opinions of the people ought always to be received with great respect and consideration. In all cases of doubtful policy, where the mind of the Representative was equally balanced, or in matters of minor importance, he admitted that those opinions ought to turn the scale. But in all great questions of national concern, and he believed this to be one of these questions, the Representative should not give up the clear convictions of his own conscience and judgment, and sacrifice them on the altar of popular opinion. A contrary doctrine so far debased the Representative below his true character, that he could not entertain it. But have not clamor and noise been mistaken for the voice of the people? A few designing, ambitious, and intriguing men have it so much in their power to produce an excitement which may be readily mistaken for public sentiment, that he must have better evidence than he had yet seen to induce him to believe that the majority of the people of this country were opposed to the law of last session. The clamor of the few may be mistaken for the voice of the many. He knew it from observation and recent experience. It was not necessary for him to say in that House, how this effect was to be produced. It was sufficient only to observe, that those in opposition to any measure are always more violent than those who assent to it; and that the busy activity of the former is perceived and felt, while the passiveness of the latter is unobserved. He did not, therefore, think that there had been that cool and dispassionate expression of the general disapprobation of this law, which ought to guide the most ambitious flatterer of the people; much more a man who entertained sentiments such as he did.

But, on this doctrine of instruction, which he had believed had been exploded by all thinking and enlightened men in this country, but which he now saw revived and most anxiously supported, he would wish to enter his dissent, and assign his reasons. It is said that the people are sovereign, and that all authority resides in them. This is not true in the extent that is laid down. The people did possess unqualified sovereign power; and all power emanates and is derived from them. But when they met in convention by their delegates, they consented to, and did part with, for their own benefit and security, certain portions of their authority. What they have not granted, they have reserved to themselves. Among the powers delegated is that of legislation. The Constitution, which is equally obligatory on the people as on Congress, until it is altered in the form prescribed by that instrument, declares that "all legislative powers therein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Certain other portions of authority are granted to the President, who has the execution of all laws, and to the Judiciary the duty of expounding them. Among the powers granted to Congress is that of fixing their own compensation. What right, he would ask, have the people to interfere in this matter, and instruct their Representatives, where they have parted with all authority on the subject? But the honorable Speaker has taken a distinction, which has been adopted by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) which both of them have totally failed to support. It is this, that although generally the people have on all subjects the right to instruct, and the Representative is bound to obey, yet that he would not be bound by instructions which would lead him to a violation of the Constitution; and the reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia—[Here Mr. TYLER explained, and said, that the Representative would not be bound to violate the Constitution, because it was of higher authority than the instructions themselves, and the people in such case having no right to do the things themselves, could not instruct others to do it for them.] Mr. C. said he took the gentleman's explanation, and in making it, he had abandoned the whole argument, and every inch of ground on which he could maintain himself.

The Representative is not bound by instructions to violate the Constitution, because those who instruct him, having no power to do the act themselves, cannot instruct others to do it for them. He would ask, can the people make laws? Is not that one of the powers of which they have divested themselves by the Constitution, which they have confided to Congress? And while that Constitution remains unaltered, are they not equally bound by it with the Representative? Does not the gentleman's argument prove it? They cannot violate the Constitution, and therefore cannot make others do it. What then becomes of the distinction? Does it not prove the absurdity of the whole argument? If this right to instruct exists, it must be a perfect, absolute, and unconditional right; and if it exists in any case it exists in all cases. Were a majority of this nation here assembled, they could enact no one law. They have parted with that portion of their authority to Congress, and having no right to act of themselves (to use the gentleman's own words) they cannot instruct us to act for them; if they attempt it, their instructions are not obligatory. Sir, to what a degrading situation does this doctrine reduce the Representative! It makes him a mere machine. The wise intent of the framers of the Constitution is frustrated by it. They meant that the people of this country should elect the wisest and best men to enact their laws; men who could discern the public good, and discerning it would steadily pursue it, regardless of any temporary excitement which might be produced by mistaken notions of the subject. Of what avail is it that we are here assembled, and gravely deliberate upon and discuss subjects, if we are not to act according to our own judgments? It is a waste of time. Wisdom, talents, and integrity are useless. He would repeat, that he would always regard the wishes of his constituents with the highest respect; but when he had once made up his mind on any question of great national policy, no consideration would induce him to surrender his conscience to their keeping. With the powers of judging in matters of legislation, under the Constitution, his constituents had surrendered to him all authority; and he would not so far betray the trust which they had reposed in him, as to give up the conscientious convictions of his own mind for those of any body of men however numerous. The people have an ample security in their own hands—the right of frequent elections. This is the only power which they have reserved, and they will use it when it suits them. Other arguments had been urged by other gentlemen illustrative of the opinion which he maintained, but which it would be needless and unbecoming in him to repeat.

Upon the policy of the law of the last session, he would say nothing. Everything had been said by others which was necessary on the subject. On all sides it seemed to be admitted that the compensation was not too high; but some thought it was necessary to repeal the law to appease the people. He thought differently. The people's reason would appease them; and he believed the time was not distant when this law, now represented as so odious, would become the favorite of the people.

Mr. TYLER said, that nothing but his respect for the talents of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) could induce him to trouble the House with any further remarks on this subject. Nothing but the high estimation in which he held the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) could have prevailed on him to have said anything, at any time, on it. But he could not but have regarded himself as committing treason against the people, to have remained silent when one of their greatest rights was brought in question. He unexpectedly saw that the few remarks he had submitted had arrayed against him, he said, many aged and experienced members. Mr. T. acknowledged that he had to combat upon very unequal ground. Not to travel back to days of fiction, he said, for a comparison, he would take the liberty of saying that he was but a gunboat opposed to a seventy-four. Although he acknowledged his inferiority, he was not disposed to yield without at least exchanging one shot. Mr. T. said he reciprocated with pleasure the assurances he had received that morning, from the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) of his not having intended to utter anything of a personal nature. He said he did not come to that House to give offence to any man. It was not the way in which a great national question was to be settled. Mr. T. then proceeded to reply to some of the arguments offered by a gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. CLAYTON,) and denied that the people had surrendered all their rights by the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The gentleman from Delaware had asked if the people could now assemble and pass laws? Mr. T. acknowledged they could not without altering the Constitution, which he contended they had a right to do whenever the public good was defeated by a longer continuance thereof. If the Government was a simple democracy, the people would act for themselves. They had, however, preferred a representative democracy, and instead of assembling themselves, had deputed agents to act for them. Not only, said he, have they a right to control these agents, but he contended they had a right to strike from existence the very constitution under which these agents acted. He said that the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) had, with a triumphant air, held up the Constitution and demanded if the right of instruction was to be found there. Mr. T. inquired if, indeed, all his political ideas had been drawn from a wrong source? He supposed that, although a young man, he had become or was becoming old-fashioned in his politics. He said that he had always understood that what powers were not expressly given by the Constitution, were retained. He would ask, then, where had the right to instruct been yielded up by the people? He inquired if the right of the States to elect a governor, &c., was reserved in that Constitution? Whether the Constitution secured to each citizen the right to pursue any avocation that best suited his fancy? Mr. T. denied that the gentleman (Mr. GROSVENOR) was a representative of Virginia, at least he was not a representative of his (Mr. T.'s) district. He begged to be permitted to represent his own district on this floor. Mr. T. said that, however much pleased his constituents might be to be represented by a gentleman of Mr. G.'s talents, yet that they would not like to be represented by a gentleman of Mr. G.'s political opinions. He protested that he had no idea of offending the sensibility of the gentleman from New York, but that he must be permitted to say that himself and that gentleman differed as widely upon this subject as the north from the south. What is the benefit of having representatives, Mr. T. inquired, from each of the States, from every district in the State? Why, sir, said he, that the voice of the people from every section may be represented on this floor, that the member may possess a fellow feeling for his constituents; that he may come charged with their wishes, and prepared to support those wishes.

He did not think the gentleman had represented his ideas fairly, when he proceeded to reason upon his supposed cases, of some twenty or thirty persons having assembled in each county of his district and voted instructions. Mr. T. said that he fortunately did not represent persons who were of the character described by the gentleman. He represented high-minded men, who could not be misled by demagogues. Mr. T. said he had distinctly reasoned upon the supposition that a majority of his constituents instructed him.

Mr. T. then proceeded to remark that, however willing he might be to receive advice from the honorable gentleman in regard to his private affairs, yet upon this subject he could not follow his advice. The gentleman from New York had cautioned the supporters of the right of instruction to beware, lest they should be found sacrificing to an idol. He would take the liberty of cautioning the gentleman against the same thing. Not a sacrifice, said he, offered on the altar of public good, but one of a more narrow and limited nature—self-pride. He had no hesitation, he said, in declaring his preference to the first idol, if idols we must have, rather than the last.

In what manner, according to gentlemen's ideas, said Mr. T., are the people to address this House—do gentlemen require that they should use the language of supplication; that they should crawl in the dust to this House, to beg and pray your high mightinesses to yield to their wishes? Is it come to this, he asked? Shall we, who are but their servants, hold out such language to them, I, for one, he said, enter my most solemn protest against it. No, sir, the people of this country are the sovereigns of this country. They will not agree to address you as slaves, but as the masters of the country. The gentleman from New York has acknowledged that with the people resides the sovereign power, and yet, in the next breath, he advances an argument which goes to show that their sovereignty consists alone in the miserable power of turning out their Representatives at the termination of their period of service. If this be all their power, they are no better than slaves, and the members of this House are their high-minded masters.

Mr. T. preferred, if authorities are to be borrowed from the other side of the water, to refer back to the days of purity in the English Parliament. To those days when English liberty was like the tree of the forest, and not to times when it had become a sickly plant that withered under the influence of Court corruption—to the times of the "Iron Barons," as Lord Chatham emphatically called them. Then, sir, it was the custom of Parliament to consult with the people before they voted on any measure. You find them, said he, leaving the Parliament and returning to their constituents to obtain their wishes. It was those times, he said, which had furnished the gentleman from New York the opportunity of passing the high encomiums upon England which he had so elegantly paid. Your common law is the offspring of those old feudal times. It is not the puny child of modern and corrupt times, but the strong, sound, and athletic offspring of the period to which he had alluded—a child of the forest. The gentleman from New York called upon him to produce the evidence that Algernon Sidney advocated the doctrine of the right of instruction. I understand him thereby as denying the existence of any such authority. Upon this point we are at issue, and here is my proof.

[Here Mr. T. read, from Burgh's "Political Disquisitions," a quotation from Algernon Sidney, to prove that he had not quoted him improperly—1 vol., page 190-1.] He then proceeded to inquire what would be the consequence of disobedience to instructions. A war between the Representatives and the people. No wise man, said Mr. T., will declare war without having some prospect of success. This would be a war in which the people would, from the very nature of things, necessarily prevail. Sir, said Mr. T., this right of instruction has been consecrated by the Revolution. What, he asked, produced that war? The mother country attempted to tax the people of this country without their consent. Their wishes were not represented in the British Parliament. They had no agency in the administration of their own affairs. The result is well known. Wise men ought to profit by experience. He cautioned gentlemen to beware how they questioned the rights of the people.*

Mr. CONNER, of Massachusetts, said, that the remarks which had fallen from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) made it necessary for him to add a few words in regard to the relation which he conceived a Representative bore to the people. If he understood the gentleman from South Carolina, he took the position, that the Constitution is the letter of instruction, and that all relation of a Representative to his constituents, at least as it regards authority, is at an end when he is elected, until his term expires. He said it was immaterial, whether the people had the absolute legal authority to annul an election, where the Representative went counter to their voice when distinctly expressed, or whether as to every purpose of expediency the Representative was bound to consult their views, and as to every practical result the people did retain and exercise such an authority. Scarcely on any subject would the people express an opinion so distinctly understood as not to be mistaken, without a deliberative assemblage; in this case they had done it, and will gentlemen undertake to say, that on a question of mere expediency, more especially as it regards the pay to the Representatives, that their voice is to be entirely disregarded? He regretted that the honorable gentleman did not reply to the case he put, as it respected war with a formidable Power. Do I understand the honorable gentleman that we are to come into this House personating justice blindfolded, and in all cases to take a view of political subjects, abstractedly from any bearing they may have on the will of the people? If a land-tax, an excise, an embargo, or war are proper, levy it, whether the people coincide in its propriety or not? This is a fine theory, but unfortunately experience is against it; unfortunately the practice of the honorable gentleman is against it. Did the honorable gentleman, when he gave his vote for war against Great Britain, assume this tone of inde-

* In a part of Mr. Grosvenor's remarks, as published in the National Intelligencer, he appears to have understood Mr. Tyler as yielding his assent to a proposition to which Mr. T. authorizes us to state he did not assent. Mr. G. represents Mr. T. as assenting to the proposition that he would surrender his conscience to his constituents. Not so. One of the reasons which would induce Mr. T. to resist instructions going to violate the Constitution, is, that he has taken an oath to support that instrument, and the manner in which he discharges his oath is a matter purely between his God and himself.—*Editors N. pendence, and say, this war has become necessary, and it is my duty to wage it, whether the people think so or not, whether the people will pay or not, whether the people will fight or not? No, sir, it was an essential inquiry with the gentleman, I believe it from his own declarations, to ascertain whether the people had arrived at such a tone of indignation, and state of impatience with the injuries under which they were writhing, that they would be willing to encounter the dangers and privations of such a severe conflict. Here the gentleman reasoned like a practical politician—yesterday—I beg his pardon—with great ingenuity, (and the gentleman never reasons otherwise,) but in this instance as the theorist. It seems that Mr. Burke commenced a patriot, but changed his politics, and became a pensioner. This, said Mr. C., is very much the case with English patriots, since the days of Hampden and Sidney. It was the case with John Wilkes. He did not mean to compare Burke with Wilkes; for there was an infinite disproportion both between the talents and honesty of these two men. But he would ask whether it was not the common experience in England, for men of talents to enter the race course as oppositionists, as patriots? The stars of peerage light and animate them on the way, and, as the chariot wheels, grow more fervid the nearer they approach the throne. The gentleman inquires, said Mr. C., where are our letters of instruction. Where are they? I refer the honorable gentleman to the chairman of the Committee of Elections. He has a letter, stating that I was elected a Representative of the sixth eastern district of Massachusetts; which means, I presume, a person sent here to carry into effect, and not to contravene their interests and views.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to explain.—The member from Massachusetts must surely have misunderstood him in attributing to him the doctrine that the voice of the people is to be disregarded. He knew too well the principles of our Government, to entertain such an opinion. It had been asserted, that the instructions were obligatory, and that a member might infer instructions from the mere unpopularity of a measure. This he denied. He looked for his instructions to the Constitution. This was the true voice of the people; the other, that which the gentleman sets up, cannot be considered the genuine voice of the people. In fact, he considered an attempt to make it obligatory, as a species of usurpation on the Constitution. Those who go about to please the people this way, may possibly succeed to render themselves popular, but they will not always in making the people happy and great. But, he believed, in this instance, they will not succeed even in popularity. The people like to see consistency and firmness in their public servants; and, if they disapprove of their acts, they would rather change them than to see them act contrary to their own judgment. This is the true remedy for our errors, should we fall into them. There is another course, said he, where it is the misfortune of the Representative to differ from his constituents on great occasions, which I think is more manly than the one advocated; I mean for the member to resign. He did not recommend this course; but he would greatly prefer it to voting against the dictates of his conscience. The gentleman asks, said Mr. C., if I would vote for a war, against the voice of the people? I, in my turn, would ask the member from Massachusetts, if he would vote for a war which, in his sincere opinion, would destroy the country, merely because it happened to be popular? Without waiting for his answer, however, he would reply to the question which the gentleman had proposed. He could scarcely conceive the case that he would vote for a war of a dangerous character, without being certain of the people; but not on the ground of obeying instruction. The reason was plain. The hearty concurrence of the people in such a war, constitutes the principal force of the country. It is as essential as cannon and ball.

Mr. CONNER resumed the floor, and said: That, when he perceived the advantage which volubility and assurance have over mere argument, he sometimes regretted he did not possess those qualities; but, on the other hand, when he saw how slowly business was matured in that honorable body, and that the most urgent interests of the country suffered from the propensity to endless debate, indulged frequently on unimportant, nay, trivial subjects, he was thankful he did not possess them. He still persisted to say, that although the people may not hold the right of instruction according to the strict tenure of law, although our seats are not ipso facto vacated should we refuse to obey instructions, yet, as to every purpose of practical expediency, we do and ought to obey the popular voice, where that voice is distinctly and urgently expressed—some important cases excepted. Call it temporizing if you please; the nature of our Government compels us to temporize, in this sense of the term. If you wish for a Government that will not temporize, invest one man with the regalia of authority, the diadem and sceptre; give him the iron arm of power, strung with the sinews of war.

Sir, said Mr. C., you can adopt no permanent measure, where the voice of the people is loudly and decidedly against it. This law will be repealed. I want no better evidence of it than the report of the honorable committee to whom this subject was referred, which urges the strongest reasons in favor of the measure, and yet terminates with a proposition to repeal. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina says he would not declare an unpopular war, because power would be wanting. What power? The will of the people. What other power does the honorable gentleman want? Have we not the power over the purse and the sword? Cannot we levy taxes, raise loans, recruit men to any extent? But how is it with the embargo? There is no cannon and ball wanting to keep that on; it goes on and it comes off with a mere paper bullet—a proclamation. And yet I venture to say, that if as much excitement against that measure had prevailed throughout the country, as there did in old Massachusetts, it would not have continued on three days, perhaps three hours, after such a disposition was known to prevail. Here, also, then the judgment of a majority of the Representatives would yield to that of the people. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina reverses the terms of the proposition, and asks me whether I would declare a war, which I should believe unjust, unnecessary, and ruinous, in compliance with the wishes of my constituents. I answer no. I would not, any more than I would violate the Constitution of my country. This is one of those cases, involving in it consequences so awful, and of such magnitude, that I should make a matter of conscience of it, and should resign my seat, which the honorable gentleman advises one to do in all cases, however unimportant, rather than to yield his judgment to that of his constituents, even in the very trifling one of our own compensation. Mr. C. said he could assure the honorable gentleman, that, whenever he wanted his advice on this subject, he would wait on him personally. Mr. C. said that he would by no means be understood to insinuate, that the honorable gentleman from South Carolina was the mere theorist; the nation knew him to be on all important subjects the practical politician; but on this he thought he chose to indulge himself in theoretical speculations. Sir, said Mr. C., no one respects more than myself the manly independence of the honorable gentleman, his extensive political knowledge, and his powers of eloquence. And as to the elegant comparison of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) of the eagle with the turkey-buzzard, alluding to the gentleman from South Carolina and those who opposed his doctrine, I can assure that gentleman, that I am as willing to admit as himself, that the gentleman from South Carolina is the eagle; that he soars in an expanse above vulgar politicians, is certain; that he is not the bird that feeds on carrion is still more certain; nor, sir, is he the political gladiator that wields his dagger on all subjects, on all sides, just as caprice, interest, or the whim of the moment may dictate.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, said he hoped he should be indulged by the House whilst he made but a very few observations on this subject. He entertained this hope the more readily (although he knew the patience of the House must be exhausted) from a consideration that although he had the honor (he might say misfortune) of having his name recorded with a majority of his colleagues, in favor of the law of the last session, increasing the pay of the members of Congress, he should stand almost alone on the question now before the House, to increase the per diem to eight dollars.

When the bill which passed into a law at the last session, was progressing through this House, I, said Mr. McL., felt but one objection to giving it my most hearty support, and that was the time it was to take effect. Although I was satisfied that the members of the present Congress were, in justice, as much entitled to the increased compensation as those who should succeed us, yet was I unwilling to give any vote which might subject me in any, the slightest degree to the imputation of having given it from selfish or impure motives. When the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) offered his amendment, fixing the commencement of the law to the 4th day of March next, I did hope my difficulties would be removed by the adoption of the proposed amendment; which amendment I most cheerfully voted for, but which was lost by a small majority. When this amendment was rejected, my difficulties again were renewed, which I mentioned to several of my colleagues and messmates. But I finally concluded that as, upon the soundest principles of justice, the members of the present Congress were as much entitled to receive the increased compensation as those who should succeed us, that the amount was small which I would receive for my two years service, and as I believed the measure proper, I reluctantly voted for the bill.

When I arrived within my district, I was much surprised to find the public mind agitated; and, to increase the excitement, two old broken-down members of Congress, who wished again to become popular—one of whom will succeed me, and represent my district in the next Congress, the other then a candidate for the Senate—threw themselves in the current, proclaimed the law unconstitutional, extravagant, and an alarming encroachment on the rights and liberties of the people; that they had served many years in Congress, and that six dollars per day was amply sufficient not only to support them whilst in Congress, but measurably to support their families in their absence, &c. These statements, from such authority, added fuel to the flame.

In addition to this, as has been justly observed by my colleague, almost every man who was a candidate for office, from that of a constable to a seat in the Legislature, denounced this law as wicked and corrupt; and I believe many honest well-meaning men were induced to believe that they were soon to pass under the iron yoke of tyranny.

Although I was not a candidate (for reasons which will readily be imagined by this House) I felt it my duty to justify my vote before my constituents. I endeavored to prove to them that the House of Representatives, who were elected directly by the people, and to them responsible for their votes, ought to be considered by them as the palladium of their rights. Hence the necessity of electing men of talents, morality, industry, and integrity, to represent them. That men of this description were more frequently found in the lower and middle walks of life (I mean as to property) than among the more wealthy part of the community; that these men, who might be styled self-made men, were generally more acquainted with the views, the wishes and desires of the great mass of the people, than those who had been dandied in the lap of fortune; that they ought to give such a compensation to their members, as would not only support them while in their service, but measurably to support their families in their absence; that, unless they did so, they must calculate on being represented only by men of wealth, which I hoped would never be the case; that except they increased the pay of the members, no man of wealth could continue to represent them long in Congress; that although men of moderate circumstances might represent them a few years, yet about the time they had informed themselves of the rules of the House, the mode of doing business, and really qualified themselves to discharge their duty with credit to themselves and utility to their constituents and the nation, they would have to quit Congress "or provide not for their household, and be worse than infidels;" these, Mr. Speaker, are some of the reasons by which I endeavored to justify my vote before my constituents. These reasons I offered to them in favor of the law of last session in the sincerity of my soul, and I would in this concise manner offer them to the House as reasons for voting to increase the per diem from six to eight dollars. I feel however some little embarrassment on this subject. I fear if the present Congress increase the per diem to eight dollars, it will be more mortifying to my successor, and no doubt to many others who have mounted the compensation bill, and will ride it to this House, to receive more than six dollars per day, as he has stated to his constituents that six dollars per day was an ample compensation, and I am sure his good sense, morality, and religion, will prevent him from willingly receiving more than what he considers a quid pro quo for his services; yet when I reflect that, if the blank should be filled with eight dollars, no honorable member who thinks it too much for his services, is bound to receive it; that he can receive less than eight dollars per day; yes, the good old six dollars if he pleases—this difficulty vanishes.

Although I believe, sir, the members of the present Congress, generally, are not under obligations to those who succeed them, still I am willing to relieve my successor from acting on this subject; not being a member of the next Congress, I can vote for an increase of their wages without subjecting myself to the imputation of having voted from selfish motives. Indeed I am satisfied, from the course pursued by my successor previous to the last election, my constituents will be convinced that I can feel no inclination to vote money into his pocket. And that if I was influenced by feeling instead of duty, I would vote for six dollars, but believing that the path of reason and duty, not feeling, is the path to honor, I freely vote for eight dollars, and, if I err, the evil can scarcely be felt until it can be corrected by the next Congress.

I am sorry Mr. Speaker, that so much time has been spent on this bill, and that the subject of instructions has been so lengthily discussed. We are sent here to legislate and pass laws, not to discuss mere abstract principles—this question of instruction rests with the Representative and his constituents; it is to them I feel responsible for my vote, it is to them I feel responsible for the manner I discharge my representative duties, and not to this House. If the honorable member from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) and others, who have opposed the right of the people to instruct, feel not under obligations to represent the views, wishes, and desires of their constituents, be it so. I for one hold, and I trust always shall hold a different doctrine whilst I remain a member of this Republic, and more particularly whilst I am a member of this body. It shall always be my pride to do the will of my constituents, when I know that will, and, when not known, to exercise my best judgment to promote their interest. I believe sir, that a large majority of my constituents are opposed to the principles of the law of the last session. I cheerfully vote for its repeal, and for an increase of the per diem, believing that the interest of the nation requires this measure, and believing also that my constituents will approve the vote.

Mr. REYNOLDS next addressed the House.

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, said it was with no small degree of reluctance that he rose to address the Chair, after the amusement which the House had received, from the very facetious gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. REYNOLDS,) who had just sat down. But, Mr. M. said, although he should not detain the House with what gentlemen had been pleased to call their experiences upon this subject, and although he was aware that he could not bring to the discussion the same ability which some honorable gentlemen had displayed, yet he would venture to say that in one respect, at least, he was as well qualified to investigate the question as any honorable gentleman who had preceded him in the debate. He was, he said, perfectly cool and dispassionate. He had no preconceived opinions to combat, nor prejudice to sacrifice. Circumstances had rendered it necessary for him to obtain leave of absence before the passage of the law, so much complained of, of the last session, by which he had involuntarily escaped both the odium and the praise which had, in different quarters of the Union, been so freely bestowed upon those who advocated or opposed it.

I do not approach this subject sir, said Mr. M., smarting under the chastisement of my constituents, for having passed the law, nor elated with the triumph of their applause for my patriotic but unavailing opposition to the measure. The presentment of a Grand Jury, which seems so fraught with terrors to my honorable colleague, (Mr. FARRIS) does not include me in its charge; nor am I embraced by the numerous toasts which have been drunk, and thank-offerings which have been rendered to the minority upon that question. Much less, do I come in forma pauperis, to propitiate the offended majesty of the people, by a sacrifice of opinions, deliberately formed, and honestly entertained, upon the altar of popular favor.

No, sir, I did not obtain the honor of a seat in this House by flattering the prejudices of my constituents; and I have too correct a knowledge of their character to believe, that it can, by such means, be retained.

From the remarks which have fallen from some gentlemen, one would think that it was indeed "contrary to the genius of our Government" to bestow any pecuniary compensation for the services of those who are intrusted with the great and important business of legislation—that the privations they endure, and the sacrifices they make, of ease and domestic comfort, as well as of fortune and business, are to be cheerfully borne, for the honor of serving the people, and for the good of the country. But, sir, upon what principle do gentlemen require that of members of Congress, which they do not expect from any other officer of your Government? Examine your Constitution. No distinction is there made between the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative departments, in this respect. The same instrument which provides that the President "shall receive for his services a compensation," and that the Judges "shall receive for their services a compensation," declares, also, that "the Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States."

By what rule of construction then, I again ask, do gentlemen contend, that precisely the same words, made use of in different parts of the same instrument, and in relation to the same subject, are to be tortured into a different meaning in different places? Sir, it is contrary to every sound principle of construction, heretofore applied to statutes, to constitutions, or any other instrument whatever—and we are therefore bound to believe that the framers of the Constitution under which we live, intended to give a precise and definite meaning to these expressions, and to place members of Congress in this respect on the same footing with the other officers of Government, by giving to each a reasonable compensation for services rendered. That this was the contemporaneous exposition put upon that instrument, appears from the act of 1789, fixing your compensation at six dollars per day; a sum which then bore a reasonable proportion to the salaries at the same time established for the Heads of Departments, and the other officers of Government. But, sir, how stood that proportion previous to the passage of the late law? Wholly destroyed. Open your statute book. Session after session, and year after year, you find additions made to their salaries, until many are double the amount of their first establishment. But, sir, to pass over the higher offices of Government, much less important to the rights of the people than a seat in this House, look at those of a humbler grade, and who have different duties to perform. Your Marshals, Commissioners of Boundaries, and Commissioners of Loans; your Collectors of Revenue, and the Governors of your distant Provinces, and their Secretaries; all these and many more, even the petty officers of your own House, receive a compensation vastly beyond what is now proposed for your own services. Nay, more—I call upon the gentlemen from Massachusetts (Messrs. KING, PARRIS, and CONNER) and upon the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) who are in favor of filling this blank with six dollars, to travel with me to their own States, and to their own districts. Sir, I will there show them their county officers, of almost every description, their Sheriffs, Clerks, and Judges of inferior tribunals, besides being in the midst of their friends, and prosecuting their other concerns, receiving from their constituents, without a murmur or complaint, much more than the trifling pittance for which these gentlemen are, out of regard to these same constituents, now contending. Even the members of the Legislature of the State of New York, a State whose policy upon this subject, at home, is exceedingly generous and liberal, receive five dollars a day for their attendance at the Assembly. I ask the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. TAYLOR) to compare that with the compensation he receives here, to say nothing of the difference in the expense of living at the two places—in the one case he would be promoting and extending his private interest and professional pursuits, in the other, making a complete sacrifice of both.

But, sir, we are told of the honor of a seat in this House, and that this, to a generous mind, is a sufficient remuneration. Sir, I appreciate, as highly as any man, the honor belonging to this elevated and important station. As we are the immediate Representatives of the people, so we are the immediate guardians of their rights; and it is for that very reason that I wish to place the Representative beyond the reach of all those temptations by which he may be assailed; and to enable him to discharge the great duties of his trust, with independence, and a single eye to the public good. But, sir, is this the only post of honor in the nation? Is there no honor attached to the office of President, Heads of Departments, Judges of the Supreme Court, Ministers abroad, and various other places in the gift of the Government and the people? And yet whoever heard that assigned as a reason for diminishing their salaries? No sir, the surest way to preserve the respectability of this House, and to make a seat here truly an honor, is to enable the people to call into their service, upon this floor, the talents and integrity of the country; to throw open your doors to men of moderate fortune, and of honorable ambition, who can here earn an honest fame, by devoting themselves to the service of the country, without entailing ruin upon their families. It is for this, and this only we contend; and believe me, sir, this course comports alike with the honor of the Government, and the permanent interests of the nation. That the compensation heretofore allowed to members of Congress is wholly inadequate to this effect, has been most satisfactorily proved by the calculations and arguments of my venerable colleague (Mr. PICKERING) and many other gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate.

But we are told by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) who addressed the House on Saturday, that the situation of the country is such as will not justify any increase of the compensation; that we are embarrassed with a heavy debt, and that the people are already pressed down with the weight of taxes imposed upon them. Sir, permit me to ask that honorable gentleman what was the situation of the country in 1789, when the old compensation was established? Then indeed your people were impoverished, your country embarrassed, the debt of the Revolution was pressing you to the earth, your credit exhausted, and your revenue a mere drop in the bucket in comparison with its present amount. And yet the statesmen of that day, men distinguished for their correct views of economy, fixed upon a compensation, which was double in value, though of the same nominal amount, as that gentleman now contends.

No, sir, while you are distributing with a liberal, not to say profuse, hand, the money of the people, to almost every object of public utility or private distress, that gentleman cannot believe his constituents will be seriously oppressed by paying their proportion of the paltry sum which constitutes the difference between the old, and the proposed compensation. Sir, it is too trifling and insignificant an amount to occupy, as it has done, so much of the attention of this House, or the nation.

Mr. MILLS then proceeded to state, that although he was in favor of the increase of compensation, he thought it should be effected by adding to the daily allowance, and not by an annual stipend. This mode was, he said, more uniform and equal in its operation. Sessions of Congress are of unequal length in different years, and the same sum which in one year would be an ample, and perhaps extravagant, compensation, might in another, and especially if there should be an extra session, be wholly inadequate. The Senate, too, were sometimes convened by the President to transact Executive business, when the House do not assemble; that branch would then be placed on an unequal footing with this House. Fix upon a reasonable and fair allowance by the day, said Mr. M., and the great ground of clamor will be removed from the people. They will then know what they pay, and the demagogues of the day will not have it in their power to excite a suspicion that their Representatives had slighted the public business, for the sake of bringing the session to an early close. Indeed, Mr. M. said, he had scarcely heard any intelligent man out of the House question the propriety of increasing the compensation. Such men had confined their complaints to the mode of increase, and that the law was retrospective in its operation, so that those who raised the compensation participated in the benefits of its increase, as well for that part of the session which had elapsed, as for that which was to come. This last grievance, if it be one, it is now too late to remedy, but the other it is still in your power to correct. What, said Mr. M., was the great object gentlemen had in view in passing the law of the last session? It was to raise the compensation, and the mode of payment was a mere circumstance, not at all necessary to the attainment of the main object. Let me then ask gentlemen in favor of the law of last session, how they can withhold their aid from those who have
